—S. 29—A compromise decree passed in contravention of provisions of S. 29 is operative and binding until vacated by appropriate proceedings 606a

—S. 32—Scope—S. 32 does not prevent Court from comparing period immediately before suit with any other period during tenancy 841c

—Ss. 32 add 35—Both the sections must be read together—
S. 35 gives discretion to the Court as to the extent to which

the enhancement should be allowed 570

—S. 35—Court has discretion to enhance rent 841b

—S. 46—Suit for ejectment—
Court should first determine fair and equitable rent and decree for ejectment should not be passed if the tenant agrees to pay such rent 533

—S. 48—S. 48 applies even if the holding is not co-extensive —Under-raiyat of a part of holding agreeing to pay to raiyat higher than 150 per cent of the rent of whole holding—Raiyat cannot recover more than 150 per cent if under-raiyat offers to pay 150 per cent 885

—S. 50—A raiyat holding at a fixed rent is entitled to the benefit of S. 50 880c

—S. 50—Hudabandi papers—
The hudabandi papers are admissible in evidence to rebut the presumption under S. 50, Ben. Ten. Act but do not by themselves charge a person with liability—They are admissible under S. 32, Evidence Act, S. 34 does not apply 854b

—S. 50—Purchase of holding by landlord in rent sale and re-settlement with the same tenant breaks the continuity 169b

—S. 50—Tenant transferring part of holding—Landlord recognizing transferee—New tenancy is created 169c

—S. 52—Measurement at partition under Estates Partition Act is no occasion upon which rent is assessed 553b

—S. 52—Time of creation of tenancy uncertain—Manner of assessment of rent not known—
Nature of rent not known—
Nothing to show whether there was measurement at inception of tenancy—Landlord must base claim upon some measurement on the basis of which rent was assessed 553c

—S. 52—Joint tenants—Right to abatement of rent must be asserted jointly by all 548c

—S. 52—The doctrine of suspension of rent depends solely upon

Bengal Tenancy Act

- the fact that the rent due is an entire sum in respect of the land demised 479b
- S. 52—Reduction in the area of holding—No stipulation in the patta that tenant would not be entitled to any reduction of rent—Tenant is entitled to the proportionate reduction of jama 406a
- S. 52 (1) (a)—Interpretation—The words "The area for which rent has been previously paid by him" mean the area with reference to which rent was assessed or adjusted 553a
- S. 85—A raiyat agreeing not to evict an under-raiyat except under certain contingencies contravenes the provisions of the section 478
- S. 85—Lease in contravention of provisions of S. 85—Tenant in possession on the basis of the kabuliyat—Dispossession by subsequent lessees—Tenant is entitled to recover land 376b
- S. 85—Application—S. 85 does not apply to homestead lands 156a
- S. 87—Abandonment—Tenant of a non-transferable occupancy holding leaving the village in Falgun 1324—Landlord giving a settlement of the holding in Baisakh 1325—Sub-lease by the tenant in Ashar 1325 and two days later sale of a portion of the holding—Period was too short for abandonment and the lease and sale did not amount to a transfer 891b
- S. 87—Part of holding sold in 1908—Subsequent partition in 1919 between co-sharers of taluk—Portion sold falling to share of plaintiff—Plaintiff suing in 1922 to eject purchaser—Purchaser cannot be ejected as he is not trespasser—Suit is also barred as adverse possession began in 1908 and not at the date of partition 876
- S. 87—Abandonment—Mortgage of a non-transferable occupancy holding—Mortgagee subsequently foreclosing and getting possession—This amounts to abandonment 848a

Bengal Tenancy Act.

- S. 87—Abandonment—Transfer of a part only or not by way of sale—Landlord cannot recover possession in the absence of abandonment 848b
- S. 87—Suit for ejectment on the ground of abandonment—Mortgagee obtaining possession by foreclosure—Mortgagee must prove that inference of abandonment should not be drawn 848c
- S. 87—Sale of non-transferable holding—Part of it in tenants' possession—There is no abandonment and landlord has no right of re-entry 748(2)
- S. 88—Receipt for rent given by the agent—Landlord is not bound by every statement therein 315b
- S. 103-A and S. 103-B—Record-of-rights finally published—Presumption under S. 103-B arises—But order under S. 103-A directing the name of a particular person to be entered is a valuable evidence as to possession by such person 298.
- S. 103-B—Record-of-rights—Entry is presumed to be correct 751a
- S. 104 (j) and S. 111-A—Entry as to rent is conclusive—Entry as to being a tenant raises only a presumption 808b.
- S. 105—Suit to recover rent as settled in a proceeding under S. 105 for jama consisting of ten plots—Tenant contending that jama consisted of three plots and not of ten plots as alleged—No decision as regards the plots of which the jama consisted by the Revenue Officer—Decision under S. 105 was held to be not operative as res judicata and the civil Court was held to have power to go into the question as to the rent of the holding 472a
- S. 105—Rent entered in the record-of-rights—Application to enhance rent—No application to correct the entry under S. 106—Rate of rent is not concluded against the landlord by such an application if tenants agree to pay higher rent 399(1)
- S. 105—Suit in ejectment—Defendant cannot get advantage

Bengal Tenancy Act

- of stay of proceedings under S. 111 by merely raising a question of status 388
- S. 105 — Application made only against one of the joint tenants — Landlord's remedy under S. 105 is exhausted 146a
- S. 105 (1)—Application for substitution even after two months from the final publication of Record-of-Rights is valid 146b
- S. 107—Decree in proceedings under S. 105 fixing the area and the rent of the holding—Landlord suing the tenants on that basis—The decree was held to be conclusive between the parties and the tenants were held to be bound to pay the rent fixed by the Settlement Officer 479a
- S. 109 — Application under
S. 105 for enhancement of rent
under S. 30 (b) withdrawn—Subsequent suit for enhancement—Subject-matter different
—S. 109 is no bar 841a
- Ss. 109-A, 105-A—(Per Page, J.) Application under S. 105-A —Custom of suspension of rent held not to exist—Decision not having been appealed against by tenant operates as res judicata in subsequent rent suit between the parties (Cuming, J., contra.) 706
- S. 109-A — Rent suit — No second appeal lies from the decision of a Special Judge, which settles a fair and equitable rent 496
- S. 109-A—Application covering matter other than that of settlement of rent—Second appeal lies 146a
- S. 148-A—A suit to fall under S. 148-A must be for the entire rent due and not a suit for the co-sharer's share of the rent only —Plaint should be looked at to see whether a case does or does not satisfy the test 347
- S. 150—Plea of excess shall not be taken cognizance of unless it is accompanied with deposit 874c
- S. 153, Expl.—Irregularity due to fraud or negligence also is covered by Explanation 859

Bengal Tenancy Act

- S. 153—'Amount claimed' includes not only statutory interest at 12½% and statutory damages but even 75% interest if agreed FB 777a
- S. 153 — Rent—When a decree is given at the rate of rent admitted by the defendants it is not a case of determination of the annual rent payable as mentioned in S. 153 512a
- S. 153—No declaration as to amount of rent in the decree—Question as to amount annually payable by tenant actually decided—Exception to S. 153 applies and the order is appeal-able 254
- S. 155—Lease—Miras karsha lease—Covenant for re-entry on breach of any condition—Landlord must give notice under
S. 155 193a
- S. 155 (b)—Landlord and tenant — Tenant precluded from transferring the land in any way—Condition that if any such transfer was effected the landlord would have a right of re-entry—Landlord or a person claiming under him can eject the transferee from the tenant—Landlord need not give notice under S. 155 (b) 113
- S. 158—Court need not re-

- S. 107—In Bengal a lease evidenced only by a kabuliyat creates lease as much as by a patta executed by landlord and accepted by tenants 392d
- S. 111—Forfeiture arises only when the tenant expressly repudiates the tenancy 312b
- S. 111—Forfeiture may arise even when tenant does not deny tenancy but sets up title of third person 312c
- S. 111 (g)—Denial of title, to work forfeiture, must be prior to suit for ejectment—Denial by one co-tenant does not work forfeiture—Suit for ejectment is not sustainable—Landlord can recover rent from all tenants 713

Trespass

- A trespasser cannot challenge the validity of a sale as between vendor and vendee 299b

WWill

- Construction — Prima facie "money" means moneys in hand

Will

or receivable at call, but the term will receive a wider or more restricted construction according to the context 794b

—Custom—A raiyat cannot bequeath his non-transferable occupancy right 360

—Revocation—No rule can be laid down as to circumstances under which presumption of revocation of will can arise 307b

Words

—“Jote” is a general term with respect to a holding and is not necessarily equivalent to a “raiyaoti jote” 880b

*—Meaning of “money”—Prima facie “money” means moneys in hand or receivable at call but the term will receive a wider or more restricted construction according to the context and the intention of the testator to be collected from the will as a whole 794b

—“Daimi” conveys the notion of fixity of rent 531(2)a —The word “strike” does not represent any legal definition or description 491b

—“Sarasari” and “bemiadi”—

Words

“sarasari” lease no doubt connotes the idea of a temporary settlement—But coupled with the expression “bemiadi” it can only mean a permanent lease but variable as to rent 392b

—“Kayemi” does not connote zamindari interest in land by any person—It means “a permanent occupancy holding” 385b

Workmen's Compensation Act (8 of 1923)

—S. 11 (6)—The phrase “that the workman has not been regularly attended by a qualified medical practitioner” should be construed as if it read “by another qualified medical practitioner” 481

—S. 12—Work undertaken by A as part of his business—Part of work entrusted to B—B sub-contracting for the same with C—One of C's workmen killed by accident—The principal for the purposes of S. 12 is A, and he can be indemnified by B—Compensation cannot be obtained under the Act for any further sub-contracting of the contract 399(2)

CALCUTTA HIGH COURT

RANKIN, C. J., AND C. C. GHOSE, J.

Imperial Tobacco Co.—Defendants—Appellants.

Albert Bonnan—Plaintiff—Respondent.

Appeal No. 45 of 1926, Decided on 21st January 1927, from the original civil suit decree of Pearson, J., D/- 25th January 1926. [Reported in A. I. R. 1926 Cal. 757.]

Instructions for the observance of customs officers published under authority of the Government of India in the Merchandise Marks Manual provide that if the "informant" is willing to give an indemnity bond the Collector, unless he is of opinion that there is clearly no reasonable cause for detention, will detain the goods for a month in order to allow of a suit being brought and if a suit is instituted will detain them until a final decision by the highest appellate Court to which the matter is taken. Such an indemnity bond is an undertaking to the Court and it does not amount to contract with the other party, nor does it ground any action at common law. It is to be enforced by application to the Court to which it was given and in the suit or proceeding in which it was given. The right to ask for an enquiry as to damages thereunder may be lost by delay but there is no rule that an enquiry must be asked for when the injunction is dissolved or when the suit is decided. Although the granting of an enquiry as to damages is a matter upon which the Court exercises its judicial discretion, it is not necessary that the party aggrieved by the interlocutory injunction should show that his opponent suppressed material facts or otherwise obtained the injunction by improper means. No limitation is provided by Indian Statute Law for such an application. Where plaintiff has brought an independent suit instead of an application, the Court has jurisdiction to treat his suit as though it were an application made in the previous suit where both proceedings are in the same Court and have been dealt with by the same Judge. Where an independent suit is necessary a mere application may have to be dismissed; but where the plaintiff has adopted a more formal and elaborate procedure than he should have adopted in applying to the correct Court, no lack of jurisdiction is involved and the question becomes one of costs and of discretion: Graham v. Campbell (1871) 7 Ch. D. 490, Ref. [P 4 C 2, P 6 C 2]

A suit for damages against defendant at whose instance plaintiff's goods were detained by customs authorities is governed by Art. 36 and not by Art. 49. [P 5 C 1]

(c) Civil P. C., S. 95—Issue of injunction apart from want of probable cause gives no cause of action—Limitation Act, Art. 40.

Apart from malice or want of probable cause, a plaintiff cannot recover damages in an independent suit upon mere proof that an injunction was granted to restrain him from doing what has since been held to be within his rights: [16 C. L. J. 34, Diss.] If A maliciously and without probable cause brings a suit against B and without suppression of facts, misstatements or other improper means, obtains an interlocutory injunction, an action will not lie at common law for the damage done to his business by the injunction: [42 Cal. 550, Foll.] The granting of an injunction is a judicial act in the fullest sense: it is not a ministerial order or an order of course or mere process or a necessary incident of any particular jurisdiction. There is nothing in the second sub-S. of S. 95 of the Code or in Art. 40, Limitation Act, 1908, which is inconsistent with the above proposition.

(d) Tort—Damages claimable by virtue of undertaking of opposite party can be claimed if notice to or fraud by opposite party is shown.

Damages to be paid by virtue of an undertaking are not necessarily confined to proximate and natural damages but may be enlarged either by reason that the opposite party had notice of all the circumstances or by reason that the case is one for the giving of exemplary damages in view of fraud or malice. [P 8 C 1]

* (e) Tort—Damages—Maliciously bringing a civil suit—Action may lie but not if the object is to defend one's own trade—Malicious prosecution—Civill P. C., S. 35-A.

Where damages are sought for the mere bringing and prosecution of a civil suit two main questions emerge. The first question is a question of the remoteness of the damage. The mere institution of the proceedings may, having regard to their character, involve damage to credit or reputation, damage to property in the sense that the defendant is put to expense, or damage to the person in the sense that he is liable to arrest. In such cases that damage is not remote but in any ordinary case the bringing of an ordinary action however maliciously and however great the want of reasonable and proper cause, will not support a subsequent action for malicious prosecution. Injury to plaintiff's business is not a ground for maintaining such a suit. The second question is as to what is meant by malice. There is some authority for the view that it is actionable for one person wilfully to injure a man in his trade if damage results to him, provided that if the real purpose is not to injure another, but to forward or defend one's own trade, then no wrong is committed and no action will lie, although damage to another ensues. In some cases malice is postulated as an element, meaning thereby that the act complained of is wilfully and knowingly done, or that it is done for the purpose of injuring another but not as connoting personal enmity or spite or some other evil motive. Wren v. Weild (1869) 4 Q. B. 790 and Sorrell v. Smith (1925) A. C. 700, Foll.

 (f) Tort—Damages—Threats intended to wilfully injure trade—Action lies.

Threats to litigate or threats to boycott are unlawful only where the purpose of the threat is "wilfully and ultraneously to injure the trade of another" as distinct from the purpose to forward one's trade: Sorrell v. Smith (1925) A. C. 700, Foll.

(g) Tort—Master and servant—False and malicious statements by servant—Master is liable.

A person is doubtless responsible for the statements of agent or servant acting within the scope of his authority, provided that they were false statements made maliciously or without lawful occasion. [P 13 C 1]

To entitle plaintiffs for damages for slander of his goods proper particulars would have to be shown in each case, the loss of the particular customer or dealer to whom they were spoken or some other really specific damage flowing from the publication to him: Leetham v. Rank (1912) 57 S. J. 111, Foll. [P 13 C 1, 2]

Per C. C. Ghose, J.—In an action for damages for slander of goods the precise words complained of must be set out in the statement of claim. It is not sufficient to allege that the slanderer used such and such words or to that effect. Plaintiff must also prove (1) that the statement complained of was made of and concerning his goods: (2) that it was false; (3) that it was published maliciously i. e., with the intention of injuring him and (4) that he has suffered special damage thereby. A trader is entitled to commend his own goods and state that they are better than the goods of another and if he does so, no action will lie against him, whatever damage may ensue from such statement. It is otherwise where a trader does not limit himself to a comparison of his goods with those manufactured by another trader and a mere statement that they are inferior in quality to his own, but goes further and makes an untrue statement of fact about his rival's goods; for example, where he states that they are rotten or unmerchantable. In such a case like this, an action on the case will lie, provided it can be proved that such statement was published maliciously and that special damage has ensued. It is not malice if the object of the trader is to push his own business. To make the act malicious it must be done with the direct object of injuring the other person's business. Therefore, the mere fact that it would injure that other person's business is no evidence of malice. [P 17 C 2; P 18 C 1]

(i) Tort—Slander of goods.

In a case of slander of goods the burden of proof of falsity of the statements is on the plaintiff. [P 14 C 2]

(j) Sea Customs Act, (1878)—Provisions are for protection of merchants as well as public—Customs officers can act on their own initiative (Ghose, J.)

The provisions under the Sea Customs Act are in some cases to be read with the provisions of the Indian Merchandise Marks Act (Act 4 of 1889), relating to false trade description and they are intended not only for the protection of manufacturers and merchants against the piracy of their marks, but also for the protection of the public against the supply of goods of an inferior or unknown quality under cover of a well-known brand. Under the Sea Customs Act, as amended by the Merchandise Marks Act, although ordinarily action thereunder is taken upon information received from the manufacturer or merchant aggrieved, there is nothing to prevent the customs officers from acting upon their own initiative. Rankin, C. J.—This suit was instituted in January 1925 for the recovery of about seven and half lakhs of rupees as damages for a variety of acts done by the defendant company. It was stated in the plaint that no part of the cause of action arose before February 1922.

The plaintiff towards the end of 1921 bought a large quantity of Gold Flake cigarettes on the terms that they should not be sold in Great Britain. The goods were two years old, they were made up in packets or cartons of tin, and 25,000 cigarettes in their cartons were packed in a strong tin-lined case. This brand of cigarettes is very well known as having originally been the manufacture of W. D. & H. O. Wills of Bristol whose successors in business are the British American Tobacco Company Limited. The goods so bought by the plaintiff had (under a temporary arrangement necessitated apparently by the war) been manufactured in America and were part of a very large number of cigarettes which had originally been intended for troops but which were now being disposed of. They had been manufactured by the British American Tobacco Company Limited itself and were thus genuine Gold Flake cigarettes and not counterfeit. The plaintiff bought them cheap at eight or nine shillings per thousand.

His case is that he contracted to buy 860 cases being $21\frac{1}{2}$ million cigarettes, that he disposed of some (apparently 194 cases) in Egypt and elsewhere, and that early in 1922 he came to India not merely to dispose of 666 cases already contracted for but also with a view to establish a continuing market in these war stocks of which further supplies in very large quantities were available or would become available.

Now "Gold Flake" cigarettes were and are sold in large quantities in India by the defendant company which is a "subsidiary" or "associated" company of the British American Tobacco Company Limited, the latter company holding at least 80 per cent of its shares. The defendant company had in 1910 acquired the business and trade-mark rights of the British American Tobacco Company Limited so far as India, Burma and Aden are concerned. For years it alone had been selling Gold Flake cigarettes in India and its price to dealers was Rs. 26 per thousand. It obtained its goods from the British American Tobacco Company in Great Britain though it had itself the right to manufacture. It sold fresh goods of British make taking back from dealers any unsold goods that were old and unlikely to be sound. It brought out its "Gold Flake" cigarettes not only in tin-lined cases but in sealed tins of fifty packets in such cases.

The plaintiff's venture was a very promising one. He could afford to sell at a price far below the defendant company's price of Rs. 36 per thousand. If he could dispose, at a start, of some 16 million cigarettes at Rs. 20 per thousand he would do very well for himself and if he could continue so to do he would do very well indeed. There were, however, at least two danger spots. So long as the public would regard his merchandise as good Gold Flake cigarettes they would prefer his article because of the price. But old cigarettes do not "stand up to the monsoon" so well as might be wished and when once the tin-lined case was opened, if not before, there was certain to be deterioration after June. That was one risk. The second was this. It was all very well to throw the defendant company out of the Indian market despite their purchase of the Gold Flake trade-mark and business but the defendant company might conceive themselves entitled to object and this might mean litigation. How far either of these risks had been considered by the plaintiff in advance it is difficult to say. Whether they were considered in combination I do not know at all.

The venture began well. The plaintiff having arrived in Bombay on the 7th February 1922 with samples sold no less than 220 cases to a Bombay firm Messrs Irani Hormuz Sheriar & Company at Rs. 23-8-0 per thousand. His counsel on this appeal has referred to the correspondence passing between the offices of the defendant company at Calcutta and Bombay and between them and their London advisers as showing that he was "tearing their trade in Gold Flake cigarettes to shreds." It seems to me that at first the defendant company's advisers in India did not appreciate this partly because they thought the goods would not last but in fact it is clear that the matter was one of great importance to the defendant company. Mr. Abbott's letter of 15th March, Mr. Macnaghten's cable received on 5th April and the cable of 10th April (which has been ruled out by the learned Judge for reasons which I do not appreciate) show what happened. The company's solicitors in India did not think they could do anything. Mr. Macnaghten in England advised that they could. He knew all about the defendant company's trade-marks and in a matter of this sort and of this importance it was most reasonable to take advice in London. It was after all a question of trade-mark law and Mr. Macnaghten was their legal adviser. It seems idle to suggest that the plaintiff has a grievance because the defendant company took advice from him.

The defendant company decided to take steps to establish that the plaintiff's scheme was an invasion of their rights. They thought it wise to take a formal assignment of the marks by way of perfecting their equitable title under the indenture of 1910 and this was not completed till the 10th May 1922. Meanwhile they applied under the Sea Customs Act to the Collector of Customs at Calcutta and at Bombay on 12th April and 1st May. The applications are in evidence and state that the goods are liable to confiscation because we consider that the importation of the above goods into India is an infringement of our trade-mark.

Indemnity bonds were given to the Collectors in the usual course and letters written to the plaintiff asking for an assurance that the goods would not be sold in India and threatening legal proceedings to restrain this. Matters really stood over to abide the result of an interview between the plaintiff and the defendant company's directors which took place on the 8th May. Suits were filed by the defendant company in Calcutta on 11th May and in Bombay on 22nd May. On 2nd May 1922 the Collector of Customs at Bombay ordered the detention of the goods till 1st June as the defendant company said there was an infringement of their trade-mark and in order to enable them to file a suit. On the 3rd May plaintiff's solicitors objected and after taking advice from the Government law officer the Collector released the goods by his letter of the 5th May.

The Collector of Customs, Calcutta, did nothing till 22nd April when he wrote to the clearing agents Samuel Fitze and Company asking what they had to say. On 11th May an interim injunction had been obtained from the Court. From an order recorded by the Collector upon another matter—the assessment of the plaintiff's cigarettes for duty—we know exactly how he dealt with the case. He was under no misapprehension as to the fact that the plaintiff's goods had been manufactured by the British American Tobacco Company and were in that, the ordinary sense, genuine, but he thought there was a prima facie case for holding that the trade-mark imported that the goods were the defendant company's and that accordingly its use by other dealers was pro tanto a counterfeit. This contention is certainly far-fetched and indeed erroneous and that the goods were not really within the provisions of the Sea Customs Act, S. 18, at all. The relevant clause speaks of goods having applied thereto a counterfeit trade-mark within the meaning of the Indian Penal Code or a false trade description within the meaning of the Indian Merchandise Marks Act, 1889.

Any detention in Calcutta after 11th May was by virtue of the interim injunction of that date. The detention under the Sea Customs Act was from 1st to (say) 7th May in Bombay and from 12th April to 11th May in Calcutta.

The chief importance of this matter lies in the fact that the learned Judge thinks that the defendant company, in applying for detention of these goods under the Sea Customs Act, were acting maliciously. It is clear that the facts as to the origin of the goods were made quite clear to the Collectors of Customs and were not in any wise misstated in either application, both of which gave as the ground "infringement of our trade-mark rights." But it is said that if one looks at Cl. (d), S. 18 of the Act it is apparent that the defendant company were maliciously accusing the plaintiff of a criminal offence and fraud, and were asking for a detention to which they knew they had no right.

It is desirable to add that there do not appear to be any regulations under S. 19-A, Sea Customs Act, but proceedings of the character now in question are governed in practice by certain "instructions for the observance" of Customs officers published under authority of the Government of India in the Merchandise Marks Manual.

As I read these instructions they provide that if the "informant" is willing to give an indemnity bond the Collector, unless he is of opinion that there is clearly no reasonable cause for detention, will detain the goods for a month in order to allow of a suit being brought and if a suit is instituted will detain them until a final decision by the highest appellate Court to which the matter is taken.

The learned Judge has held that the plaintiff cannot now recover damages against the defendant company for the detention of his goods by the Collectors of Customs at Bombay or Calcutta. In his opinion Art. 36, Limitation Act, applies and Art. 48 does not apply. S. 24, Limitation Act does not assist the plaintiff here if only because it is impossible to hold that the special damage flowing from these detentions in May and June 1922 did not result before the end of that year. The only contention therefore which need be referred to is that urged upon us by the plaintiff's counsel that Art. 49 applies because though the detention was by the Collectors nevertheless the defendant company moved them to detain and are responsible for the detention as for their own act. In my opinion this argument fails whether as construction of Art. 49 or otherwise. It is quite true that all persons in trespass who aid or counsel, direct or join are joint trespassers: Petrie v. Lamont (1).

but the wrong done by the Collectors here is that being lawfully in possession of the plaintiff's goods they wrongfully i. e. contrary to their duty refused to deliver possession to him and so their possession became unlawful. This is what is contemplated by the concluding words of the first and third columns of Art. 49. But this cannot possibly be predicated of the defendant company who never had possession of the goods. I think, therefore, that the learned Judge was right in holding that this cause of action is time barred under Art. 36.

The defendant company filed two suits against the plaintiff one in this Court and one in the High Court of Bombay. The Calcutta suit was filed on 11th May 1922 and an interim injunction was on that day obtained ex parte from Mr. Justice Greaves restraining the plaintiff from removing from bond or dealing with 100 cases lying with the Customs. The defendant company gave an undertaking in damages. On the 8th June the motion for an interlocutory injunction was disposed of in the presence of both parties. The plaintiff undertook to deposit Rs. 20,000 (less certain charges) on fixed deposit in the Alliance Bank and the interim injunction was dissolved. There is no suggestion of any false statement or suppression made by the defendant company on this occasion. Indeed on asking to be referred to the affidavits I am informed that they were not even put in evidence in the present case. The suit came on for hearing promptly. It was heard by the same learned Judge whose decree in this case is now under appeal and was dismissed by him on 18th July 1922. An appeal to this Court was dismissed on 10th April 1923: Imperial Tobacco Co. v. Albert Bonnan (2), and an appeal to His Majesty in Council shared the same fate on 15th May 1924 Imperial Tobacco Co. v. Albert Bonnan (3).

The suit in Bombay was filed on 22nd May 1922 and notice of motion for an injunction was given for 2nd June. It was heard on 19th June, that is, after the injunction given in Calcutta had been dissolved. On the 19th June the matter was settled by cross-undertakings. The plaintiff undertook pending the hearing not to sell any cigarettes then in Bombay or to arrive in Bombay and the defendant company undertook in damages. The plaintiff's undertaking not to sell was discontinued by order of the Court on 2nd August 1922 (soon after the Calcutta suit had been dismissed by the trial Judge) on his agreeing to keep an account, and this undertaking to keep an account came to an end by order of 20th September 1923 (by which time the appeal in Calcutta had been dismissed). The suit was abiding the result of the Calcutta case and the appeals therein, and was dismissed on 10th November 1924 after the decision of the Privy Council in that case.

The plaintiff says that these suits were brought maliciously and without probable cause and that he is entitled to damages accordingly; including, as I understand, damages for the harm done to his business by the litigation which discouraged dealers from buying goods which might land them in trouble. He says further that in this suit, and apart altogether from the defendant company's undertakings in damages, he can in these circumstances recover damages in respect of the Calcutta injunction and of his own undertaking not to sell given to the Bombay Court. It has further been maintained on his behalf more particularly on the authority of Bhut Nath v. Chandra Binode (4) that so far as the Calcutta injunction is concerned, the obtaining of it was an act in the nature of trespass to property and it is not necessary for the plaintiff to prove malice or any want of probable cause.

At least two of these contentions appear to me to be wrong. The plaintiff has (if he has not lost it by delay) the right to apply to the High Court of Bombay to give him damages pursuant to the cross-undertakings given to that Court on 19th June 1922. In no other way can he get damages for carrying out his own undertaking whether the suit was or was not malicious or an abuse of process. I agree entirely on this point with the learned Judge.

That, apart from malice or want of probable cause, a plaintiff can recover damages in an independent suit (and apart from any undertaking given by the defendant) upon mere proof that an injunction was granted to restrain him from doing what has since been held to be within his rights—this too is a proposition I dissent from. It is to be found in the case cited but it proceeds upon a misunderstanding of such cases as Clissold v. Cratchley (5) which are cases where trespass was committed and the defendant unsuccessfully set up as his justification an order of the Court which was disregarded because it was irregularly obtained by the defendant. To speak of an injunction as on a par with such a case as being an act in the nature of trespass to property, is merely to obscure matters by a false analogy or else to beg the question. S. 95, Civil P. C., is rendered almost absurd by such a doctrine.

On the 11th May 1922 when the interim injunction was obtained in Calcutta restraining the plaintiff from removing from bond or selling or disposing of 100 cases of cigarettes then lying with the Customs, the defendant company gave an express undertaking in damages. This was an undertaking to the Court and the character of such an undertaking has been discussed in the case of Smith v. Day (6). It is not such an undertaking as amounts to contract with the other party, nor does it ground any action at common law. It is to be enforced by application to the Court to which it was given and in the suit or proceeding in which it was given. The right to ask for an enquiry as to damages thereunder may be lost by delay but there is no rule that an enquiry must be asked for when the injunction is dissolved or when the suit is decided: Ex parte Hall (7). It is clear now that although the granting of an enquiry as to damages is a matter upon which the Court exercises its judicial discretion, it is not necessary that the party aggrieved by the interlocutory injunction should show that his opponent suppressed material facts or otherwise obtained the injunction by improper means: Griffith v. Blake (8). In the present case the plaintiff before taking action waited until the defendant company's appeal has been disposed of by the Privy Council but he commenced this suit promptly thereafter. This in substance satisfies the general rule that the Court ought to be asked to enforce the undertaking within a reasonable time after it is ascertained that the injunction has been improperly granted: see Ex parte Hall (7).

No limitation is provided by Indian statute law for an application to enforce an undertaking given to the Court. It is, I think, clear that the plaintiff has brought an independent suit when for this purpose he should not have done so but this Court has jurisdiction to treat his suit as though it were an application made in the previous suit since it happens that both proceedings are in the same Court and have been dealt with by the same Judge. Where an independent suit is necessary a mere application may have to be dismissed; but where the plaintiff has adopted a more formal and elaborate procedure than he should have adopted in applying to the correct Court, no lack of jurisdiction is involved and the question becomes one of costs and of discretion. If the plaintiff had launched an application in the previous suit and asked that it should stand for hearing until the matter had been finally decided in appeal, he would have taken a very reasonable course. I consider also that in this case an enquiry as to damages could not have been refused as there is every reason to think that the interlocutory injunction would interfere with his chance to sell his cigarettes. [cf. Graham v. Campbell (9).]

that we should discuss the proposition that if A maliciously and without probable cause brings a suit against B and without suppression of facts, misstatements or other improper means, obtains an interlocutory injunction, an action will lie at common law for the damage done to his business by the injunction. But I think it right to say that this proposition is one to which I refuse assent. I respectfully agree with the observations of Fletcher J. in Mohini Mohan v. Surendra Narain (10) and with the decision in that case. It is the duty of a Judge before granting an injunction to satisfy himself that the plaintiff is not without reasonable and probable cause—indeed to satisfy himself, that it will stand a "higher test. Unless the malice of the plaintiff results in some form of misstatement or leads the plaintiff to suppress some fact or facts—it was his duty to lay before the Court—I have much difficulty in seeing how the granting of the injunction is causally related to the plaintiff's act or state of mind. The present case is probably unique in that no attempt is made to prove what was laid before the Court or that it contained any element of falsity. The granting of an injunction is a judicial act in the fullest sense: it is not a ministerial order or an order of course or mesne process or a necessary incident of any particular jurisdiction. The Quartz Hill case (11) is not really directed to the present question but to the question whether a plaintiff has a cause of action from the mere bringing of a suit or other proceeding. I observe that in one well-known text book (Clerk and Lindsell on Torts 7th edn. p. 654) it is suggested that the observations in that case (at p. 684) made by Brett M. R. show that in no case can a person who has maliciously and unreasonably set the law in motion absolve himself from the consequences which he invited and brought to pass, by the suggestion that their immediate cause was a mistake on the part of the Judge. On this view doubt is thrown upon Daniels v. Fielding (12). A careful perusal of the learned Judge's argument in criticism of what Martin B. said in Johnson v. Emerson (13) leads me to think that this is a misunderstanding of what he said. His point is that damage to credit results from the mere present action of a bankruptcy petition and that Martin B. has failed to notice this special feature of that kind of petition. Of the proposition imputed to him I think it quite likely that he would have thought as of Martin B's doctrine—its fault is that it is too large.

There is nothing in the second sub-section of S. 95 of the Code or in Art. 40, Sch. 1, Limitation Act 1908, which is inconsistent with what I have already said. These indeed are curious places in which to expect to find the law as to the conditions upon which a suit for damages caused by an injunction is sustainable, and it cannot be disputed that upon some conditions such a suit is competent as where an injunction has been procured by fraud.

For reasons already given I think, however, that it is within our power to make an order such as would have been more properly asked for by an application in a previous suit. But as a large body of evidence has been taken in this case and as the plaintiff has sought the judgment of the Court as to the amount of damages to which he is entitled, I propose that in ordering the inquiry this Court should give a decision upon one important matter for the guidance of the officer conducting the inquiry. I refer here to the question whether or not the plaintiff can, as part of the damages caused by the injunction, recover damages for loss caused to him by the cancellation of two contracts for the purchase of cigarettes from Messrs. Venis and Company. In para. 18 of the plaint the plaintiff says that the Army & Canteen Board cancelled 258 cases of cigarettes by reason of which he was put to a loss of Rs. 1,09,549. In para. 16 he says that 160 cases, portion of 220 cases which he had contracted to sell in Bombay have not been shipped to India, but in Ex. O. as the summary of his claim which the learned Judge has acted upon, he definitely states of these 160 cases also that they were cancelled by sellers in England. Now it appears that the cancellations relied upon are cancellations made by the plaintiff himself and not by his sellers. On the 17th May 1922, he wrote to Messrs. Venis and Company:

Regarding my order of the 21st December for five million cigarettes, I very much regret to inform you that owing to an injunction served upon me by Messrs. Imperial Tobacco Co. of India Ltd. here, which restrains me from importing these goods, I shall not be able to take delivery of the cigarettes and therefore please cancel same and oblige.

On the 6th June 1922 he wrote to Messrs. Venis and Co.

I am in receipt of your letter of the 16th May for which I thank you. I note that you can still make arrangements for the delivery of the goods. But I regret to inform you that owing to an injunction brought against me by the Imperial Tobacco Co. in India, I am restrained from importing these goods and they have commenced proceedings against me. Therefore I regret I cannot accept your kind proposition. Thanking you for the same.

This is said to refer to six million cigarettes. Now the Calcutta injunction was granted ex parte on the 11th May and referred only to 100 cases then lying with the Customs. The injunction was dissolved on the 8th June. As I understand the reasoning of Brett L. J. in Smith v. Day (7) damages to be paid by virtue of an undertaking are not necessarily confined to proximate and natural damages but may be enlarged either by reason that the opposite party had notice of all the circumstances or by reason that the case is one for the giving of exemplary damages in view of fraud or malice. But it is to my mind reasonably clear that in respect of neither cancellation was the plaintiff's conduct rendered reasonable by the ex parte injunction; as to the 100 cases in Calcutta, the plaintiff did not even wait to see what view the Court would take when he appeared to put his case before it. The Court in fact dissolved the injunction on the 8th June. The plaintiff's conduct may well have been reasonable in the sense that he now saw that he was involved in litigation about questions of "trade mark" law or by reason of the fact that he was not prepared to peril too much upon his chances of success. His claim that the contracts were cancelled against him is anything but candid, and I am of opinion that this matter ought not to be canvassed again at the enquiry which we direct. It is upon this condition only that I am prepared to direct such enquiry.

I turn now to consider whether the plaintiff is entitled to damages by reason of the mere bringing and prosecution of the suits in Calcutta and Bombay. I do not doubt that the existence of this litigation came readily and quickly to the notice of the trade. I do not doubt that the agents of the defendant company informed their customers in the trade and the persons whom they employed to canvass for orders, of the facts that they had started these proceedings. I do not doubt either that some dealers refused to buy the plaintiff's goods because they did not wish to offend the defendant company; others because the defendant company would refuse to deal with them or to deal with them on the same favourable terms as before; others because they anticipated that they too might become involved in litigation if they dealt in plaintiff's goods; others again because they were definitely informed that the defendant company were prepared to assert their rights to prevent the plaintiff's cigarettes being sold in India by bringing whatever suits were necessary to establish and enforce their alleged right. The learned Judge has held that the defendant company made full use of the litigation in Bombay and Calcutta with its attendant threat of trouble to others as an obstruction to the plaintiff and as a deterrent.

He has further held that the suits were throughout designed as a disparagement of the plaintiff's goods and an obstruction to the unfettered exercise of his rights as a trader, of which I have no doubt the company made the fullest use the whole time of the litigation lasted and whenever occasion so required.

These observations of the learned Judge are to be coupled with his finding that the defendant company were actuated by malice and that their case had no reasonable or probable cause.

These findings taken broadly make an impressive case of hardship and oppression. It is, however, necessary to remember that while the plaintiff might have been well entitled to seize the opportunity afforded by the existence of war stocks, to drive the defendant company out of the market, he was not in law entitled to rely upon the defendant's passivity in the face of his laudable endeavour; the defendant company were certainly entitled, if they chose, to protect themselves by refusing to deal at all with any person who sold the plaintiff's goods. This complaint may be put upon one side. The rest of this formidable indictment may, I think, be examined under two heads. The first head is the bringing of the suits; the second is the question of threats. As regards the bringing of the suits I think the relevant authorities are Savile v. Roberts (14) and the Quartz Hill case (11) already cited to which I would add Wren v. Weild (15); Pitt v. Donovan (16). The recent case of Sorrell v. Smith (17), although the immediate subject-matter is illegal combination or conspiracy, is I think particularly valuable because it takes account of the right of a rival trader to forward or defend his trade and it examines the notion of malice in connexion therewith.

Where damages are sought for the mere bringing and prosecution of a civil suit two main questions emerge. The first question is the leading element in the Quartz Hill case (11). That question is a question of the remoteness of the damage. The mere institution of the proceedings may, having regard to their character, involve damage to credit or reputation, damage to property in the sense that the defendant is put to expense, or damage to the person in the sense that he is liable to arrest. In such cases that damage is not remote but in any ordinary case the broad cannon is true, that in the present day and according to our present law, the bringing of an ordinary action, however maliciously and however great the want of reasonable and proper cause, will not support a subsequent action for malicious prosecution. The counsel for the plaintiff company have argued this case with great ability but they could not point to a single instance since. Westminster Hall began to be the seat of justice, in which an ordinary action similar to the actions of the present day, has been considered to justify a subsequent action on the ground that it was brought maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause. Quartz v. Hill case (11).

Lord Bowen in saying this had clearly before his mind that incidentally matters connected with the action, such as the publication of the proceedings in the action, may do a man an injury; and Brett, M. R., in deciding that a petition to wind up a company was within the exception mentioned in Savile v. Roberts (14), stated:

the present case is reduced to this question namely: Is a petition to wind up a company more like an action charging fraud or more like a bankruptcy petition.

If injury to the fair fame of a person is not for this purpose a consequence of an action charging fraud, it is impossible to contend that injury to his business is, in such a case as the present, a consequence of the mere bringing of the suit.

The second question which arises in cases of this sort is as to what is meant by malice. When we turn from criminal prosecutions to civil cases special consideration is here necessary. A prosecutor has no right to employ the process of the criminal Court save for the purpose of vindicating public order and justice. If there is no reasonableness in his charge that of itself raises at least a suggestion that he is acting from some other motive and that he is serving some private end in an oblique and improper manner. This may be mere spite or it may be something quite different, such as the desire, by abuse of the criminal process, to obtain money or other properties or to induce the person prosecuted to come to a compromise. Now in a civil suit the obtaining of money or property or the assertion of valuable rights is the declared object of the plaintiff. He is entitled, if he thinks that he has chances of success, to put the matter to the test and in this way it is daily experience that Courts of law are invited to do things which it would be most unreasonable for them to do. When two people are competing for the same market success on the part of the one necessarily involves injury to the other except indeed the market be capable of expansion so as to admit them both. Holt, C. J., in Savile v. Roberts (14), in dealing with the second "objection," gives this answer:

There is a great difference between the suing of an action maliciously and the indicting of a man maliciously. When a man sues an action he claims a right to himself, or complains of an injury done to him; and if a man fancies he has a right, he may sue an action If the law will permit a man to make a false claim out of a Court of justice (i. e. outside a Court of justice) a fortiori when he proceeds to assert his right in a legal course.

In Wren v. Weild (15) Blackburn, J., stated that an action may be brought under such circumstances as to render it morally wrong and injurious in fact is certain, though the authorities leave it in doubt whether, under any circumstances, the person so sued can recover damages for the vexation and annoyance caused to him by the false suit.

He refers to the case reported in Maynard's Long Quinto that for bringing a suit manifestly wrongful, to the defendant's own knowledge, an action might be maintained.

He refers to a case of Sir G. Gerard v. Dickenson (18) where the defendant had brought a suit alleging against her own knowledge that a certain lease, which was a forgery and which she knew was a forgery gave her title to the land. It is clear from his judgment that the furthest limit to which Blackburn, J., was prepared to go was that if a man sue me in a proper Court, yet if his suit be utterly without ground of truth, and that certainly known to himself, I may have an action of the case against him for the undue vexation and damage that he putteth me unto by his ill practice.

The case before him was one in which the defendant had warned persons who had purchased or were intending to purchase machines from the plaintiff, that the machines sold by the plaintiff were infringements of the defendant's patents and that if they used the machines he would claim royalties and should take legal proceedings. The actual decision was as follows :

If, therefore, the plaintiffs had given evidence, on which the jury might properly find that the defendant made the communication to the intended purchasers mala fide, and without any intention to institute legal proceedings at all against the purchasers, so that it was not a step taken in support of his real or fancied right against the purchasers, but entirely out of malice against the plaintiff; or on which the jury might have properly found that the defendant did not (to use Lord Holt's phrase) so much as fancy he had a right, but as Lord Hobart says, knew certainly that his claim was utterly without ground of truth, we are inclined to think that it would have been proper to leave that evidence to the jury in support of the plaintiff's allegation that the defendant's letter was false and malicious.

In the judgment of Lord Cave, L. C., in Sorrell v. Smith (17), it is stated in effect that there is some authority for the view that it is actionable for one person wilfully to injure a man in his trade if damage results to him. This, however, is guarded by a proviso to the effect that if the real purpose is not to injure another, but to forward or defend one's own trade, then no wrong is committed and no action will lie, although damage to another ensues. Of malice the Lord Chancellor stated this :

In some cases malice is postulated as an element in the tort which I am considering. If the word means only that the act complained of is wilfully and knowingly done, or that it is done for the purpose of injuring another, then it is rightly used in this connexion. But there is a tendency to interpret malice as connoting personal enmity or spite or some other evil motive, and as such a motive is neither an essential element in the offence nor conclusive of the offence having been committed, it seems better to forgo the use of the word.

I propose, in view of these authorities to consider in the light of the judgment of the learned Judge whether the defendants' suit was brought with the knowledge that it had no chance of success and for purposes other than the purpose of endeavouring to establish in Courts of law that the defendant company had the right to object to the plaintiff's importations and whether the defendant company's desire was to injure the trade of the plaintiff as distinct from the desire to forward or defend its own trade. It is suggested that the defendant company's case was essentially absurd because the plaintiff company's cigarettes had been made in America by the successors of W. D. and H. O. Wills of Bristol. Two cases have been cited to us which I think dispose of this contention : Imperial Tobacco Company (Newfoundland) Ltd. v. Duffy (19) and Dunlop Rubber Co. v. Booth (20). It is necessary, therefore, to see whether it can be imputed to the defendant company that their superior officers were well aware that they had no case for claiming that their assignment of all the Indian rights in the Will's trade-mark should carry a similar consequence. It cannot I think be contended on a perusal of the proceedings at the trial or in appeal that the defendant company were treated by the Courts as persons advancing an idle claim. The case offered no little scope for dispute upon the principles of law applicable. Nor was it one in which the careful sifting of somewhat numerous and complicated considerations was unnecessary. The learned Judge who tried the case gave a very clear analysis of the whole matter, but I do not find in his judgment dismissing the suit an indication that he found the decision of it to be noticeably free from difficulty. In matters of trade-mark law the directors of a company are necessarily in the hands of their legal advisers. In this case they had received from the solicitors in India advice to the effect that the law was against them. Their legal experts in London took another view for the reason, as I think that they failed fully to appreciate the consequences in India of the lack of statutory title to a trade-mark. These consequences have in the course of the case worked out with reference to S. 22, Trade-marks Act, 1905 which authorizes the "splitting up" of a trade-mark territorially. In any view the burden of proof lies heavily upon the plaintiff to show that the defendant company were persuaded that Mr Macnaghten was wrong and the Indian solicitors were right.

In deciding appeal to the Courts of law they must have known not merely that they were committing themselves to some expense, but that they were taking the risk of an adverse decision which might affect them seriously in future. If the learned Judge has meant to find that the defendant company throughout the whole history of the litigation was intentionally riding for a fall, that they were not really endeavouring or hoping to establish by a judicial decision the right which they claim, but well knowing that they would ultimately lose, brought the actions for the sole purpose of obstructing plaintiff in the exercising of rights which they know to be his, I respectfully differ from his conclusion. It certainly was, not merely the object, but the declared purpose of the defendant company to prevent the plaintiff from selling these cigarettes in India. The plaintiff had at least several opportunities for considering whether the case made against him was transparently hollow. One was when he gave his undertaking to the Bombay High Court: another was when he decided to cancel the two contracts with Venis & Co already mentioned. I do not know what transpired on the 8th June 1922 before Mr. Justice Greaves, but his order puts the plaintiff upon terms as to making a deposit with the Alliance Bank as a condition of dissolving the ex-parte injunction. I will assume for the present purpose that in applying to the Collector of Customs the directors acted mala fide in the sense that they claimed a relief to which they knew that they had no right. Even so it is a different question whether, in taking steps to approach a Court of law for the decision of their claim, they knew that they had no right whatever or were merely suing to serve an oblique and improper purpose. The plaintiff has in my opinion wholly failed to show that either suit was brought mala fide, without belief that the defendant company had any reasonable cause or from oblique motives other than a motive to make their case good in furtherance of their own trade interests. I do not see that their case, though it turned out to be bad and has been overruled for reasons which I do not presume to challenge, was in any way such as to make it wrong or unreasonable for them to lay it before the Court.

With regard to the allegation that the defendant company maliciously threatened to harass the plaintiffs' customers with vexatious litigation, I do not know what threats in particular, if any, the learned Judge has considered to be proved, and I fail to find this allegation in the plaint. It appears to me that what I have already said is sufficient to dispose of any question as to threats, whether threats to litigate or threats to boycott, as such threats are unlawful only where the purpose of the threat is wilful and ultraneously to injure the trade of another as distinct from the purpose to forward one's trade: Sorrell v. Smith (17).

The plaintiff further claims damages for what is sometimes shortly called "slander of goods," i. e. for statements false, made maliciously or without lawful occasion, and causing him special damage.

Paragraph 11 of the plaint pleads this cause of action as follows:

The defendant company through its officers, servants and agents throughout India rumoured and caused to be rumoured and circulated statements to the effect that the Gold Flake cigarettes imported by the plaintiff were inferior in quality and otherwise than they represented to be, and they were otherwise than in a sound and good merchantable condition and that they were inferior to those sold by the defendant company, that they were not genuine Gold Flake cigarettes, and that the plaintiff had no right to import and sell them as such.

The allegation of special damage refers to all the other grievances as well as to this, viz. the injunction, the detention by the customs, and two suits etc. Para 12 states:

By reason of the aforesaid conduct and acts of the defendant company, its servants, agents etc., the plaintiff failed to find a market for the cigarettes imported and arranged by him to be imported into India, and agents and dealers refused to purchase and sell or advertise or expose for sale the said cigarettes imported by the plaintiff as aforesaid with the result that by reason of the said wrongful and malicious acts and conduct of the defendant company, the plaintiff was put to considerable loss and expenses particulars whereof are hereinafter set out.

Speaking roughly the special damage for which he claims is his whole loss by reason of the failure of his venture.

The pleadings disclose no particulars of the time when, person to whom, or by whom the alleged "rumours" were set on foot; in fact no particulars of publication whatsoever nor any specific statement what on any occasion was actually said. No particulars were applied for.

The trial took place in November and December 1925. In July 1925 the plaintiff examined one witness on commission in Bombay, and in August 1925 another before this Court de bene esse. From the evidence of the former, Merwan Hornfusi Irani, the defendant company got before trial notice of two occasions on which slander of goods was said to have been uttered. In the evidence of the latter (a dismissed servant of the defendant company called Carr) I cannot see that there is any indication of or reference to any slander now relied upon or anything else that looks like slander of goods. The defendant company, in August, examined de bene esse Mr. Abbott, their Chairman, and I see in his cross-examination no reference to any other slanders uttered by him or in his presence save a reference to one of the two occasions already mentioned. The witnesses examined by the defendant company in July on commission in Bombay are asked nothing about slanders.

• At the hearing in December 1925 the plaintiff called nine witnesses including himself. The plaintiff's evidence-in-chief upon this part of the case forms questions 258 to 266 and contains only the most harmless hearsay. The only witnesses called to speak to any question of slander of goods are Ardeshir Khodadad, Kali Pada Roy, N. N. Chakrabarti and M. N. Jarvar. The learned Judge deals specifically with two only of the alleged slanders: one said to have been uttered by Carr to Khodadad in March or April 1922, and another said to have been uttered by Mr. Ryan and Akhil Pal in July 1922 to Kali Pada Roy and his partner's father, N. N. Chakrabarti.

On the hearing of this appeal it appeared to us that this part of the case, as presented by the pleadings, was not at the time of the trial in a fit condition to be tried and that it would be as well to require a statement from the plaintiff of particulars of those slanders which he claimed to have proved. Accordingly particulars were filed alleging 13 several publications, five of which were in our opinion afterthoughts in no way within para. 11 of the plaint and dealt with neither by cross-examination nor by the learned Judge as substantive counts in the case. The attempt made was intelligible in view of the plaintiff's difficulties as to limitation. These five new counts are based upon letters and the charge is that the defendant company published them to their typists and staff, to the Collector of Customs and the Imperial Bank. It seems reasonably clear that neither counsel nor the learned Judge at the trial was aware that they were assisting at the investigation of any such case. In my opinion these counts must be disallowed altogether. They appear to amount to be a contention that for the defendant company even to claim that the plaintiff's goods infringed their trade-mark rights was an actionable wrong.

There remain eight allegations of slander of goods and it is our duty to examine each in the light of the findings of fact come to by the learned Judge. As I read his judgment the only finding of untrue statements made by anyone for whom the defendant company can be responsible is that while it is true that the plaintiff's goods were old and true, that his packing was inferior to the defendants' the defendant company's servants, when warning dealers that these were not the goods of the defendant company, impressed on dealers a non-existent difference in the quality of the goods.

This seems to be a slender foundation for an action of this character brought against a rival trader and I am not surprised that learned counsel for the plaintiff is not quite content with it. (The judgment then narrated and discussed the several occasions and proceeded.) It will be observed that all the occasions on which slander of goods is specified, except the twelfth and thirteenth (which refer to letters dated 1st and 14th January 1924 sent to the Imperial Bank), are occasions in 1922. The learned Judge has held that they are covered by Art. 36, Limitation Act, and are time barred. But he says that it is a fair inference to draw from the evidence that the statements alleged and complained of continued to the extent already mentioned to be repeated within two years before suit.

Accordingly, as I understand, part of the damages which he awards is awarded for false and malicious statements made by persons unknown to persons unknown upon occasions and at times as to which the only information is that they were subsequent to January 1923. All that is known as to the contents of these statements is that they affirmed a non-existent difference in the quality of the goods.

What is supposed to be known as to the special damage caused is still more difficult to understand. Because, though the learned Judge has disallowed the claims in respect of detention of goods by the Collectors of Customs at Bombay and Calcutta, in respect of the undertaking given by the plaintiff to the High Court of Bombay, and in respect of all alleged slanders of goods prior to January 1923, he has in the end awarded damages on the basis of compensation to the plaintiff for the whole of his loss of profit on all the cases destined for the Indian market which he had contracted to buy, i. e., 666 cases. I am not quite sure what the figure of Rs. 23-8-0 represents, but I think it is intended as the average price which the plaintiff could have obtained if the defendant company had never in any way claimed that he was infringing their trademark rights or that their own goods were superior in quality to his.

With all respect to the learned Judge I cannot assent to this way of dealing with the case so far as it is a case of slander of goods. The defendant company is doubtless responsible for the statements of agent or servant acting "within the scope of his authority" (in the wide sense given to that phrase by modern law) provided that they were false statements made maliciously or without lawful occasion. In the present case malice is on any view an essential and I do not understand how malice or falsity or special damage can be attributed in the vogue.

As the question of special damage enters into questions of limitation I desire to observe that no single one of the slanders referred to in the plaintiff's particulars filed in this Court is within the doctrine of Ratcliffe v. Evans (21). Proper particulars would have shown; in each case the loss of the particular customer or dealer to whom they were spoken or some other really specific damage flowing from the publication to him: Leetham v. Rank (22).

The statements here founded on are not statements printed in a newspaper or made at an auction or to the public or to a fluctuating and transitory class of persons unknown to the plaintiff. Neither the nature nor the circumstances in any case require the admission of evidence of general loss of business as the natural and direct result produced. It is in order to get out of the requirement of alleging and proving actual temporal loss with certainty and precision in each case that the plaintiff here claims to multiply by an imaginary number whatever he has proved. In my opinion he has proved no specific instance. But let it be assumed that he has proved three or six instances, all within limitation. One dealer refuses to buy, another cancels his purchase, another goes on buying as before:

If the words are uttered to an individual and repetition is not intended except to a limited extent general loss of custom cannot ordinarily be a direct and natural result of the limited slander. [cf. Ratcliffe v. Evans (21).]

Proof of a conspiracy to slander the plaintiff's goods, proof of twenty slanders, part of a course of conduct, proof of orders to a group of servants to go out uttering slanders throughout a market—this might bring a case to the same level as a case of publication in a newspaper and require the Court as a matter of common-sense to let in evidence of general loss of business. But where is the necessary proof? The case is not a case of conspiracy or illegal combination as learned counsel for the plaintiff expressly concedes. If the number of specific instances proved does not show slander broadcast, what is the evidence to contradict the evidence of Abbott and of Selfe? Is it the evidence of the dismissed servant Carr? or Javar's evidence—not put to Carr of what Carr said to him? Carr's evidence in cross-examination is that practically it was left to them to do what they liked so long as they did nothing wrong. He does also say that he was told to tell the dealers that the plaintiff's goods were old stock from the army and were inferior in quality. This last element does not appear in his statement as to what he actually said to the dealers. It seems, however, highly reasonable to suppose that if the defendant company were selling fresh stock from England with a superior form of protection from the weather and were asking Rs. 36 per thousand they would represent to dealers that these goods were better than the plaintiff's, who charged a bare three-quarters of their price. Otherwise they could hardly hope to sell their cigarettes at all.

I pass over the statements of the plaintiff to the customs on the question of duty. That the question is one of opinion is clear enough. Sheriar says he gave some of plaintiff's cigarettes to two or three customers to test them and that he relied on their opinion and his own also. He does not smoke himself, but he did not think there was any difference between plaintiff's and defendant's cigarettes. He would not pay the same price for goods two years old as for fresh goods. Carr says the plaintiff's cigarettes were absolutely sound and marketable when they first came to Bombay. Khodadad says the quality was equal. Das says he had no complaints. Bonnan Sheriar says they were fresh goods and saleable and he had no complaints. Kali Pada did not compare them with the defendant's, but says they were of good quality and condition and sold easily. Chakrabarti says some customers would choose the one and some the other. The assistant from Samuel Fitze & Company says they thought the plaintiff's goods to be sound in condition and quality and when they sold they had no complaints. Jawar who says he is an expert, asked how the plaintiff's goods compared with the defendant's, replied "Not much difference" and "practically the same." It was put to Mr. Abbott in cross-examination that at the previous trial an experienced dealer gave evidence that the plaintiff's cigarettes were the better. He says it is a question of opinion and that ordinarily dealers and smokers would not detect the difference at once. His letters to London on 10th May 1921 said the plaintiff's goods were in surprisingly good condition, but "they smoke rather nastily in our opinion." On this evidence I fail to see why a claim that the fresher and dearer goods were better should not come within the principle that trade competition is no wrong or why malice should be imputed to the defendant company's servants for their efforts to persuade dealers that their article was superior: White v. Mellen (23) Hubbock v. Wilkinson (24). In "slander of goods" the burden of proof of falsity is on the plaintiff and in my opinion he fails to prove this statement to be false.

In these circumstances I do not propose to discuss the question of limitation as to this head of claim, but in my opinion S. 24 and Art. 36 give the plaintiff two years from the accrual of special damage.

In my judgment this appeal should be allowed. Treating this suit as an application in Suit No. 1610 of 1922 for an inquiry as to the sum to which the plaintiff is entitled as damages for loss caused to him by the injunction granted therein on 11th May 1922, we should order that such inquiry be held in the said suit by the Official Referee and direct that in ascertaining the said sum the Official Referee do not include any loss accruing to the plaintiff by reason of the cancellation of the contracts referred to in the plaintiff's letters of 17th May 1922 and 6th June 1922 to Messrs. Venis & Co. Quoad ultra the suit should be dismissed. The plaintiff must pay to the defendant company (1) their costs of this appeal and also (2) their costs of the suit before the learned Judge less a sum of Rs. 300 which we assess as the reasonable costs of an application for an inquiry as to damages.

It is desirable to make clear that except for the direction just mentioned as to the cancelled contracts the question of the amount of damage caused by the injunction is at large. The figure of Rs. 23-8-0 mentioned by the learned Judge was arrived at on a footing which is not consistent with our decision and the Official Referee will be in no way bound by it. The inquiry should be treated as an urgent reference.

C. C. Ghose, J—This is an appeal against a judgment delivered by my learned brother Mr Justice Pearson on the 25th January 1926, by which he held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages from the defendant company on account of certain wrongful and malicious acts alleged to have been done by the latter.

The facts giving rise to the litigation, out of which the present appeal has arisen, are to be found, among other things, in Ex. D.D. being the judgments delivered in a previous litigation between the parties by Mr. Justice Pearson on the 18th July 1922, by the late Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Richardson on the 10th April 1923, Imperial Tobacco Co. v. Albert Bonnan (2) and by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the 13th May 1924: Imperial Tobacco Co. v. Albert Bonnan (3). It will, therefore, and also in view of the judgment just delivered by my Lord, not be necessary for me to state in detail herein the facts involved in the present appeal, except in so far as may be necessary.

In the action in which the said judgments were pronounced, the present appellants sought to restrain the plaintiff from selling in India a well-known brand of cigarettes, namely Wills Gold Flakes which, for many years, they alone, as assignees of the trade-mark and goodwill for India, had been importing into and selling in India. It appeared that the present plaintiff having bought as surplus war stock, over 21 millions of the said cigarettes cheaply in England from purchasers from the manufacturers (who had granted to the present appellants the sale rights for India) was able to undersell in India the present appellants. It was held in that litigation that the sale by the present plaintiff in India of the said cigarettes involved no breach of contract, misrepresentation, or infringement of the rights of the present appellants, and that it had not been shown that the latter had acquired any independent reputation as importers of the said cigarettes. Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee held confirming the judgments delivered in this Court that the present appellants' suit was not maintainable see Imperial Tobacco Co. v. Albert Bonnan (3).

On the 28th February 1922 and on the 8th March 1922 the first lot of the plaintiff's goods arrived in Bombay and Calcutta respectively and he sold also certain cases to dealers. Thereupon the present appellants who had, up to then, exclusive rights of selling the said cigarettes in India, applied to the Collectors of Customs in Bombay and Calcutta for orders for detention of the plaintiff's goods, on the ground, among others, that having regard to the trade history of the appellants' cigarettes and the acquisition by them, as purchasers of the goodwill in India of the business with which the trade-mark "Wills' Gold Flakes" was associated, the importation of the said cigarettes by the plaintiff (who was not one of the appellants' customers) infringed their trade-mark. The plaintiff's goods were accordingly detained by the Collectors of Customs in Bombay and Calcutta. This was done in order to allow the appellants an opportunity of having the matter adjudicated upon in the civil Courts.

Thereafter, two suits, one in this Court and another in the Bombay High Court, were filed on the 11th and 22nd days of May 1922 respectively. On the first mentioned date, application having been made by the appellants an interim injunction was issued by this Court restraining the plaintiff, his servants and agents, from disposing of certain cases of cigarettes then lying with the Customs authorities in Calcutta. The application for injunction was disposed of by this Court in the presence of both sides on the 8th June 1922, when, it appearing that the present plaintiff had placed a sum in fixed deposit of Rs. 20,000 into the Alliance Bank of Simla, it was ordered that the interim injunction referred to above should stand dissolved. It was stated in the order of the 8th June that the present plaintiff's claim for damages, if any, owing to the interim injunction having been granted was reserved. In the Bombay suit the present appellants gave notice of motion on the 23rd May 1922 for a similar injunction against the present plaintiff. The application in the Bombay Court was disposed of on the 19th June 1922 when the present plaintiff, who was the defendant, having given an undertaking not to dispose of or in any way deal with the cigarettes then in Bombay or to arrive in Bombay, the application stood over by consent of parties till the hearing of the suit. Subsequently, by an order of the 2nd August 1922 the then defendant's undertaking of the 19th June 1922 was vacated, as he agreed to keep an account of the sale of the contents of the cases of cigarettes mentioned in the plaint in the Bombay suit, without prejudice to the rights of the defendant, if any, to claim damages consequential on the order of the 19th June 1922.

On the 21st January 1925 the plaint in the present suit was put on the file and in it the present respondent complained that certain acts which had been done by the present appellants were malicious and wrongful and he accordingly claimed damages for seven and half lacs of rupees. The acts complained of are referred to in paras. 6 to 11 of the plaint, and they may be classified as follows:

(a) Wrongfully and maliciously applying to the Collectors of Customs in Bombay and Calcutta and obtaining from them orders for detention of the plaintiff's goods.

(b) Wrongfully and maliciously instituting and prosecuting suits against the plaintiff in the High Courts in Bombay and Calcutta.

(c) Wrongfully and maliciously obtaining an injunction against the plaintiff from this Court as referred to above.

(d) Wrongfully and maliciously giving notice of motion for an injunction against the plaintiff in the Bombay High Court in which proceeding the plaintiff was made to give an undertaking on the 19th June 1922.

(e) Wrongfully and maliciously publishing various statements slandering the plaintiff's goods.

Mr. Justice Pearson held that the conduct of the appellants in regard to the proceedings before the Collectors of Customs in Bombay and Calcutta was malicious and without reasonable and probable cause. He also held that in filing the two suits in Bombay and Calcutta and in proceeding with them as they did, the appellants acted maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause. He found that the appellants did make and circulate statements slandering the plaintiff's goods, and he finally came to the conclusion that the plaintiff had suffered damages by reason of the said acts on the part of the appellants. According to Mr. Justice Pearson, the plaintiff started off very well in Bombay in the matter of the sale of his cigarettes, but instead of finding a fair field for his goods, he found himself faced with obstruction after obstruction, maliciously raised by the appellant's courses of delay, disparagement of his goods, assertion of unfounded rights—all of which interfered with the plaintiff's right to trade in his goods in the ordinary way. In short, Mr. Justice Pearson came to the conclusion that in this case the appellants had acted mala fide and with ulterior motive from beginning to end. He therefore directed an enquiry for ascertainment of damages sustained by the plaintiff under heads 1 to 5, both inclusive, in Sch. A to the plaint on the basis of a uniform rate of Rs. 23-8-0 per thousand cigarettes [vide A. I. R. 1926 Cal. 757—Ed.]

The appellants' case has been elaborately argued and I propose to examine whether the plaintiff's said claim for damages are sustainable in law or on facts. To start with it appears that in respect of claim (a), the orders for detention of the plaintiff's goods in Bombay and Calcutta by the Collectors of Customs were made under the provisions of the Sea Customs Act (Act 8 of 1878) under the usual indemnity from the appellants on the ground that the goods which the plaintiff had imported into India bore a counterfeit trade-mark. Whether they bore a counterfeit trade-mark or not, it is quite clear that the provisions under the Sea Customs Act are in some cases to be read with the provisions of the Indian Merchandise Marks Act (Act 4 of 1889) relating to false trade description and that they are intended not only for the protection of manufacturers...and merchants against the piracy of their marks, but also for the protection of the public against the supply of goods of an inferior or unknown quality under cover of a well-known brand. As I read the provisions of the Sea Customs Act, as amended by the Merchandise Marks Act, it is clear that although ordinarily action thereunder is taken upon information received from the manufacturer or merchant aggrieved, there is nothing to prevent the customs officers from acting upon their own initiative. The sections of the Sea Customs Act which were referred to at the hearing before us are Ss. 18 and 19A. The appellants might have taken an exaggerated view of their rights, but it appears that the customs officers really proceeded in this matter to act in accordance with the instructions for the observance of customs officers appearing on p. 11 of the Merchandise Marks Manual (1925) issued by the Government of India. (The judgment then discussed facts and evidence and proceeded) Now the first question which arises for consideration is whether the present plaintiff has, on the evidence before us, substantiated his contention that the statements made to the two Collectors of Customs were untrue in fact, that the said statements were made maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause and that he has suffered special damage thereby: see the case of Nemi Chand v. Wallace (25). From what has been stated above in my opinion there cannot be any doubt that the appellants did really believe in what they had stated to the customs authorities and that there was no misstatement of fact on their part. On the evidence on record, both oral and documentary, I am not prepared to say that the appellants had made statements to the Collectors of Customs which were untrue in fact and untrue to their knowledge, or had acted maliciously in the proceedings before the said Collectors. The plaintiff has, in my opinion, entirely failed to bring his case within the rule laid down by the Court of appeal in the case of Nemi Chand v. Wallace (25). So much on the evidence; but the plaintiff's claim on this head is bound to fail for another reason, namely, that it is, having regard to the dates set out above, barred by limitation under Art. 36, Sch. I, Limitation Act, as was indeed held by the learned Judge at the bottom of p. 528 of the paper-book, Part I. It was urged that Art. 49 applied to this part of the plaintiff's case. In my opinion Art. 49 does not apply at all; the detention of the plaintiff's goods was not by the appellants.

I will now deal with claim (e), which is referred to in para. 11 of the plaint, which runs as follows:

The defendant company through its officers, servants and agents throughout India rumoured and caused to be rumoured and circulated (statements) to the effect that the Gold Flake cigarettes imported by the plaintiff were inferior in quality and otherwise than they were represented to be, and that they were otherwise than in a sound and good and merchantable condition and that they were inferior to those sold by the defendant company, that they were not genuine Gold Flake cigarettes and that the plaintiff had no right to import and sell them as such.

The learned Judge's finding on this point is summed up in the following words:

Undoubtedly the company's servants were going round warning dealers that they would not be responsible for the plaintiff's goods. There is no harm in that and they could properly employ the whole of their organization in broadcasting it to the dealers. There seems to be no doubt, however, that they went further and wrongly impressed on dealers a non-existent difference in the quality of the goods, and also made full use of the litigation in Bombay and Calcutta with its attendant threat of trouble to others as an obstruction to the plaintiff and as a deterrent. That is a clear impression which I retain after hearing the evidence.

The learned Judge further added, in dealing with the question of limitation raised on behalf of the defendant company as an answer to this part of the plaintiff's claim, the following:

In so far as the cause of action may be slander of title or slander of goods the limitation would be either one year under Art. 25 or two years under Art. 36. The latter is in my opinion applicable in the circumstances for I think the action would be on the case. Nevertheless I think it is a fair inference to draw from the evidence that the statements alleged and complained of continued, to the extent already mentioned, to be repeated within two years before suit, particularly having regard to the continuance of the previous suits which throughout were designed as a disparagement of the plaintiff's goods and an obstruction to the unfettered exercise of his rights as a trader, of which I have no doubt the company made the fullest use the whole time the litigation lasted and whenever occasion so required. I am not prepared to say that in any view of the matter the company is excused by the principle that a trader is entitled to protect his own property and his own interests because I think in this case there was mala fides and ulterior motive from the beginning until the end.

It will be seen from the above that the learned Judge laid particular stress on the pendency of the previous suits for founding his conclusion that slander of the plaintiff's goods had been going on.

Now, in an action for damages for slander of goods the precise words complained of must be set out in the statement of claim: there are many authorities that it is not sufficient to allege that the slanderer used such and such words or to that effect. Has this rule been complied with in the present instance by the plaintiff? In my opinion para. 11 of the plaint offends in every way against this cardinal rule; and it is surprising that the defendant company should not have insisted in the Court of first instance on full and sufficient particulars being furnished to them before the pleadings were closed, in respect of the matters alleged or suggested in para. 11 of the plaint. However, at the hearing before us, learned counsel on behalf of the plaintiff has furnished us with a number of particulars of the statements complained of and we have been taken through them. (The judgment then discussed the evidence and proceeded.) Now, to succeed in an action for slander of goods, the plaintiff must allege and prove (1) that the statement complained of was made of and concerning his goods; (2) that it was false, (3) that it was published maliciously i. e. with the intention of injuring him and (4) that he has suffered special damage thereby. A trader is entitled to commend his own goods and state that they are better than the goods of another and if he does so, no action will lie against him, whatever damage may ensue from such statement.: see White v. Mellin (23).

It is otherwise where a trader does not limit himself to a comparison of his goods with those manufactured by another trader and a mere statement that they are inferior in quality to his own, but goes further and makes an untrue statement of fact about his rival's goods, for example, where he states that they are rotten or unmerchantable. In a case like this, an action on the case will lie, provided it can be proved that such statement was published maliciously and that special damage has ensued: see Lyne v. Nicholls (26). It is not malice if the object of the trader is to push his own business. To make the act malicious it must be done with the direct object of injuring the other person's business. Therefore, the mere fact that it would injure that other person's business is no evidence of malice: see Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. v. Mason Talbot (27).

This being the state of the authorities, I have carefully scrutinized the evidence of Sheriar and Khodadad and of the other witnesses on the side of the plaintiff taken along with the evidence of the officers of the defendant company and I have come to the conclusion that no statements in slander of the plaintiff's goods were made by the officers of the defendant company which would give rise to a cause of action. I am not unmindful that it was alleged on the plaintiff's side that the plaintiff's goods were said to have been described by Mr. Selfe, an officer of the defendant company, on one occasion as being "kharab" or unmerchantable; but I am unable to place any reliance on that piece of evidence. In what context was the word used, if used at all? I have grave doubts if it was at all used. The learned Judge says that the statements alleged and complained of continued to be repeated within two years before suit.

Where is the evidence in support of this statement? It is possible and indeed likely that the appellant gave instructions to their officers to see that their rights are protected so far as the market was concerned; but I do not find on the evidence that lying reports about the plaintiff's goods were made by the company's officers or were authorized by them, if ever made or that they were repeated from time to time within two years before suit. Therefore, on the facts I must hold that the plaintiff has failed to make out any case whatsoever in support of his claim (e), as set out in para. 11, of the plaint. His claim for damages must also be held to be barred under S. 24 and Art. 36, Limitation Act.

I now proceed to consider the case set up by the plaintiff under claim (b), as set out above, viz. wrongfully and maliciously instituting suits against the plaintiff in the High Court in Bombay and Calcutta. On behalf of the appellant it has been contended before us on the authority of the case of the Quartz Hill Consolidated Gold Mining Co. v. Eyre (11), that no action would lie against the defendant company for having brought the suits in the Bombay High Court and in this Court referred to above. Brett M. R., in that case observed as follows:

I entirely agree that even although civil proceedings are taken falsely and maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause, nevertheless no action will lie in respect of them, unless they produce some damage of which the law will take notice.

Bowen, L. J. observed as follows:

I start with this, that at the present day the bringing of an action under our present rules of procedure, and with the consequences attaching under our present law, although the action is brought falsely and maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause, and whatever may be the allegations contained in the pleadings, will not furnish a ground for a subsequent complaint by the person who has been sued, nor support an action on his part for maliciously bringing the first action. To speak broadly, and without travelling into every corner of the law, whenever a man complains before a Court of justice of the false and malicious legal proceedings of another, his complaint, in order to give a good and substantial cause of action, must show that the false and malicious legal proceedings have been accompanied by damage express or implied. The reason why, to my mind, the bringing of an action under our present rules of procedure and under our present law, even if it is brought without reasonable or probable cause and with malice, gives rise to no ground of complaint, appears to me easily to be seen upon referring to the doctrine laid down by Holt, C. J. in

Savile v. Roberts (14). He there said that there were three sorts of damages, any one of which would be sufficient to support an action for malicious prosecution. (1) The damage to a man's fame, as if the matter whereof he is accused be scandalous. And this was the ground of the case between Sir Andrew Henley and Dr. Burstall: Raym. 180.....(2) The second sort of damages, which would support such an action, are such as are done to the person; as where a man is put in danger to lose his life, or limb, or liberty, which has been always allowed a good foundation of such an action.....(3) The third sort of damages, which will support such an action, is damage to a man's property, as where he is forced to expend his money in necessary charges to acquit himself of the crime of which he is accused, which is the present charge. That a man in such case is put to expenses, is without doubt, which is an injury to his property; and if that injury is done to him maliciously, it is reasonable that he shall have an action to repair himself.

It is clear that Holt, C. J., considered one of these three heads of damages necessary to support an action for malicious prosecution. To apply this test to any action that can be conceived under our present mode of procedure and under our present law, it seems to me that no mere bringing of an action, although it is brought maliciously and without reasonable or probable cause, will give rise to an action for malicious prosecution. In no action, at all events in none of the ordinary kind, not even in those based upon fraud where there are scandalous allegations in the pleadings, is damage to a man's fair fame the necessary and natural consequence of bringing the action. Incidentally matters connected with the action, such as the publication of the proceedings in the action, may do a man an injury; but the bringing of the action is of itself no injury to him. When the action is tried in public, his fair fame will be cleared, if it deserves to be cleared: if the action is not tried, his fair fame cannot be assailed in any way by the bringing of the action.

To apply the second head of damage, namely, those injuries which are done to the person; the bringing of no action under our present law and under the ordinary rules of procedure will involve as a necessary and natural consequence damage to the person. The third sort of damage, the existence of which will support such an action as this, is damage to a man's property. The same observation applies to this third head of damage. The bringing of an ordinary action does not as a natural or necessary consequence involve any injury to a man's property, for this reason, that the only costs which the law recognizes, and for which it will compensate him, are the costs properly incurred in the action itself. For those the successful defendant will have been already compensated, so far as the law chooses to compensate him. If the Judge refuses to give him costs, it is because he does not deserve them. If he deserves them, he will get them in the original action; if he does not deserve them, he ought not to get them in a subsequent action. Therefore, the broad canon is true that in the present day, and according to our present law, the bringing of an ordinary action, however maliciously and however great the want of reasonable and probable cause, will not support a subsequent action for malicious prosecution.

I do not say that if one travels into the past and looks through the cases cited to us, one will not find scattered observations and even scattered cases which seem to show that in other days, under other systems of procedure and law, in which the consequences of actions were different from those of the present day, it was supposed that there might be some kind of action which, if it were brought maliciously and unreasonably, might subsequently give rise to an action for malicious prosecution.

It is unnecessary to say that there could not be an action of that kind in the past, and it is unnecessary to say that there may not be such an action in the future, although it cannot be found at the present day. The counsel for the plaintiff company have argued this case with great ability; but they cannot point to a single instance since Westminster Hall began to be the seat of justice in which an ordinary action, similar to the actions of the present day, has been considered to justify a subsequent action on the ground that it was brought maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause. And although every Judge of the present day will be swift to do justice and slow to allow himself as to matters of justice to be encumbered with either precedents or technicalities, still every wise Judge who sits to administer justice, must feel the greatest respect for the wisdom of the past, and the wisdom of the past presents us with no decisive authority for the broad proposition in its entirety which the counsel for the plaintiff company have put forward.

In this case it is contended on behalf of the appellants that when they instituted the suit in this Court and in Bombay in 1922, they had a perfectly genuine and reasonable case which they could present to the Courts: see in this connexion Imperial Tobacco Co. (Newfoundland) v. Duffy (19) and Dunlop Rubber Co. v. Booth (20); and it was never suggested at any time that the actions brought by the appellants in this Court and in the Bombay High Court were malicious. It is quite true that the actions did not succeed; but it is contended that mere dismissal of a suit is no evidence whatsoever of there being no reasonable and probable cause for the institution thereof. It is further urged that all that the appellants did was to take steps for the purpose of protecting their trade in which they had been engaged for a number of years and where their cigarettes had acquired an enduring reputation and that in circumstances like these malice will not be imputed: see Sorrell v. Smith (17). On behalf of the plaintiff it has been argued that the right of a defendant to institute a regular suit for compensation after 'the termination of certain previous proceedings is clearly recognized in S. 95, sub-S. 2, Civil P. C., and that in India the matter is not concluded by the authority of the case, Quartz Hill Mining Co. v. Eyre (11). It is not disputed, however, that in such a suit for compensation one of the ingredients which the plaintiff must prove is malice, in addition to the facts required to be proved by S. 95, Civil P. C., see the case, Nanjappa v. Ganapathi (28). In this case, whether the matter is looked at from the point of view indicated in Quartz Hill Mining Co. v. Eyre (11) or from that referred to in S. 95, Civil P. C., the present plaintiff must in my opinion fail on the facts. On the evidence on record which I have read and re-read, I can find no trace of malice or of want of reasonable and probable cause on the part of the present appellants, in instituting the suits in this Court and in the Bombay High Court. They had received expert professional advice from London that they had a fair case to go to Court with, having regard to the authorities on the subject, and in these circumstances and without more it is difficult to see why the appellants' suits in Bombay and Calcutta should have been described as malicious. On this conclusion it is not necessary for me to refer to the question of limitation; but if I had to pronounce an opinion on the question of limitation, I should be prepared to hold that the plaintiff's claim for damages under this head is barred by Art. 6, Limitation Act.

I next come to the question whether the plaintiff has made out his case under claim (d). The facts in connexion with this branch of the case have already been set out by me in an earlier portion of this judgment and I need not, therefore, refer to the same here. It appears to me that having regard to the consent order of the 19th June 1922 in the Bombay suit, and having regard to the undertaking in the Bombay suit, the plaintiff cannot seek any relief in this Court in respect of any claim he may have for damages. Further, if he had any case under this head, it is barred by limitation.

There now remains for me to consider the question whether the plaintiff is entitled to any relief under claim (e). The plaintiff relies upon the case of Bhut Nath v. Chandra (4). In my opinion that case lays down the proposition that an injunction is in the nature of trespass to property in terms far too broad and I am unable to agree with it. Now the plaintiff is seeking to recover damages that had accrued to him by reason of the temporary injunction granted at the instance of the appellants in the suit in this Court. In the proceedings in which the temporary injunction was issued, an undertaking was taken from the appellants to compensate the plaintiff for any loss that might arise by reason of the injunction. Such an undertaking is on the authorities to be enforced by an application to the Court which granted the injunction: see Smith v. Day (6). In that case Jessel, M. R. observed as follows:

But the Court has a discretion, and before it will grant damages it must be satisfied that the injunction was improperly obtained, and that the defendant reasonably abstained from going on with his building, and that under all the circumstances damages ought to be given. It may happen that an interlocutory injunction is dissolved for delay or some cause which entitles the plaintiff to an interlocutory injunction, though not to relief at the trial, and then at the trial a perpetual injunction is granted. The Court in such a case has a discretion whether, under all the circumstances, the defendant ought to have damages in respect of the interlocutory injunction having been improperly granted, though a perpetual injunction is granted at the trial. Then, again, the Court must have regard to the amount of damages; if it be trifling or remote the Court would not be justified in directing an enquiry as to damages, though the injury might not be so remote that an action would not lie. Then again the time at which the application is made is material. Having regard to the decisions, we are not entitled to say that the application for an inquiry must be made either when the injunction is dissolved or at the trial. One of these must be the most proper time. The application may be made when the injunction is dissolved, but if made then it probably will be ordered to stand over till the trial. If made by motion subsequent to the trial, the party moving is subject to some disadvantage, for the application is one which should be made speedily and not after the Court has forgotten the circumstances; see also Griff v. Blake (8).

It would, therefore, appear that the enquiry into damages can be and is ordinarily had by means of an application to the Court which originally granted the temporary injunction. In this case, the proceedings, as will be seen from what has been stated above, did not finally terminate until the 13th May 1924. The present plaint was filed on 21st January 1925. It is contended, however, on behalf of the plaintiff that he is not limited to making an application in the suit in which the temporary injunction was granted for enquiry into damages; but that he has an independent right to bring a suit for compensation and that such right exists is clearly recognized by the terms of Art 42, Limitation Act. The procedure on the original side of this Court, being what it is, I think the proper course for the plaintiff should have been to make an application to the Court which granted the temporary injunction and ask for an enquiry into damages. The plaintiff, however, has not been guilty of unreasonable delay in coming to this Court with his present plaint and I think, in the circumstances of this case and for the reasons given by the learned Chief Justice, the plaint in this suit may be treated as an application for an enquiry into damages that might have been sustained by the defendant by reason of the temporary injunction issuing from this Court. The result, therefore, is that in my judgment on all the claims except claim (c) the plaintiff must fail and that as regards claim (c) there should be an enquiry into damages as indicated above. What the nature of those damages should be has been indicated by the learned Chief Justice and it is not necessary, therefore, for me to refer to it.

I, therefore, agree with the learned Chief Justice as regards the order which he proposes to make.

and, as I understand, the only creditor of the estate remaining unpaid. The applicant asks that the provisions of the scheme may be enforced and sets out in prayer B particulars of the relief that it seeks. There is another application by the representative of Kalidas Laik for an order annulling the scheme, upon the ground that the administration of the scheme has been carried on with negligence and irregularity, and without regard to the terms of the scheme, and, therefore, that the Court ought to hold that the scheme cannot proceed without injustice or undue delay, and the scheme ought to be annulled and the debtor adjudicated insolvent under S. 31 (1), Presidency Towns Insolvency Act (3 of 1909). The Bank and the widow of Mukundlal Laik, one of the debtors, oppose the application for annulment of the scheme upon the following grounds :

(1) that the applicants have no locus standi to present the application ; and (2) assuming that they are persons entitled to ask the Court to re-adjudge the debtors insolvent and annul the scheme, that in the exercise of the discretion with which it is invested the Court in the circumstances ought to dismiss the application.

As regards the first ground of objection to the annulment of the scheme and the re-adjudication of the insolvent, in my opinion, there is no legal basis upon which the contention of the objectors can be sustained. The objectors urge that the effect of an order passed by the Court under S. 31 (1), Presidency Towns Insolvency Act, would be to adjudicate the debtors insolvents for a second time, the later adjudication being wholly independent of the original insolvency. Since the scheme was approved by the Court Mukundlal Laik has died, and the objectors, therefore, contend that in these circumstances the only person who is entitled to apply for the administration of the deceased debtor's estate is a creditor under S. 108, Insolvency Act. That that is not so in my opinion is clear from the wording of S. 31, which provides that the application may be made "by any person interested and it is not disputed that the Laiks are such persons. I am of opinion that when a debtor is "adjudicated" or "re-adjudicated" such adjudication is not independent of the original insolvency, although, no doubt, between the date when the scheme was approved and the date when the debtor is re-adjudged an insolvent under S. 31 in respect of the law relating to insolvency he is a free man. In my opinion his legal position is analogous to that of an insolvent who has obtained his discharge but whose discharge ultimately is cancelled, during the period between the date when he obtained his discharge and the date when the discharge is cancelled. In either case, during that period the debtor is a person sui juris ; but, in my opinion, after the acceptance and approval of the scheme the jurisdiction of the Court continues, and the scheme, when accepted and approved, operates only as a conditional discharge, and subject to S. 31 (2) upon annulment and re-adjudication the status quo ante is restored : Ex-parte Bacon (1); Re Hardy (2). Williams on Bankruptcy (13th edn) at p. 99. It follows, therefore, where a scheme has been approved and is subsequently annulled, and the debtor dies after the scheme has been approved and before it is annulled, that S. 93, Insolvency Act, applies ; and, notwithstanding the death of the debtor, any person interested has a locus standi to apply that the debtor be re-adjudged an insolvent for the purpose of the further administration in insolvency of the deceased debtor's estate.

In my opinion, the second ground of objection also ought not to prevail. In considering whether it ought to re-adjudge the debtor under S. 31, the Court in the first instance should have regard to the position of the creditors, and if the Court is of opinion that the creditors will not be benefited by an order annulling the scheme and re-adjudicating the debtor, in ordinary circumstances the Court will not make an order of re-adjudication under S. 31.

Now, the only creditor who remains unpaid is the Benares Bank, and the bank strenuously urges that it would be against the interest of the bank that the scheme should be annulled and the debtors re-adjudicated. On the other hand, the Court must have regard to all the circumstances in considering whether an order ought to be made under S. 31, and Mr. B. K. Ghose, on behalf of the Luiks contended that so much delay and irregularity has taken place during the sixteen years in which this estate has been in the hands of the official assignee that it would work injustice to all the parties concerned if the scheme were allowed to proceed. I have considered the matter, and, in my opinion, the Court ought not to allow the scheme to be annulled in the present case. (The rest of the judgment is not material for this report.)

Civil P. C., O. 1, R. 9—Suit for declaration of right of pasturage—Cause of action arises only against persons obstructing the right—Ultimate owners of the land are not necessary parties.

The cause of action for a suit arises only against the persons who are responsible for the infringement of the right.

Plaintiffs sued for a declaration of their right of pasturage over the suit land under an implied grant from the Mirasidars on the ground that the defendants had obstructed them in the enjoyment of this right. Defendants alleged that the land in suit appertained to their taluk and they were in possession of it and pleaded that the suit was bad for non-joinder of the Mirasidars.

Held: there was no cause of action against the Mirasidars and therefore they were not necessary parties: A. I. R. 1921 Cal. 622 and A. I. R. 1924 Cal. 1050, Dist. [P 24 C 1, 2]

Judgment.—The plaintiffs appeal against the decree of the lower appellate Court dismissing their suit on the ground of non-joinder. In the suit the plaintiffs claimed the right of pasturage on their own behalf as well as on behalf of the residents of the village of South Enathabad against the defendants on the ground that the defendants had wrongfully obstructed the right which they were in the enjoyment of, with the permission of and amounting to an implied grant by the mirasdar for over 100 years. Defendants 1, 2 and 3, who are now the respondents before us, contended that the portion of the land in suit with which we are now concerned appertained to their taluk and that they were in possession of it. They further denied the plaintiffs' right of pasturage over this land. As regards the objection on the ground of non-joinder of parties the written statement filed on behalf of these defendants refers to the objection in two paragraphs. In para. 3 the objection is taken that the suit is bad for non-joinder and mis-joinder of parties, no details, being given; and it is one of the typical objections that are taken almost in every statement filed in the mofussil along with the objection of limitation, want of cause of action, and the frame of the suit, which objections also have been taken in the present case. In para 14 of the written statement these defendants allege that they have no concern with the land from which the plaintiffs are said to have been dispossessed by defendant 5 and, therefore, there has been mis-joinder of parties. The Court of first instance gave a decree to the plaintiffs. The defendants appealed and the Subordinate Judge, without going into the case held, on a preliminary objection, that the suit was bad for non-joinder of parties, and dismissed it. Against that decree the plaintiffs have appealed before us and it is contended on their behalf that the view taken by the lower appellate Court in the circumstances of the case is erroneous.

The plaintiffs' case is that they are in the enjoyment of this right of pasturage over the land in suit under the implied grant of the mirasidars for over 100 years. They further allege that in such exercise of their right they were obstructed by the defendants in the suit. It appears that, in order to meet the objection upon this ground, the plaintiffs did make some of the landlords parties to the suit; but they did not appear or resist the plaintiffs' claim. The defendants' case is that the lands exclusively belong to them. In such a state of the pleadings the Munsif, in our opinion, was right in holding that the question of mis-joinder or non-joinder of parties did not arise. The Subordinate Judge, on the other hand, thinks that a suit of the present nature, namely, a suit for declaration of the right of pasturage over another's land, cannot be maintained in the absence of the owners of the land. We are unable to assent to such a broad proposition. On the plaintiffs' case the owners are unnecessary parties. The cause of action for a suit arises only against the persons who are responsible for the infringement of the right. It appears that in the deposition of one of the plaintiffs in a criminal case he mentioned three persons as the maliks of the lands in dispute. We do not know what lands the criminal case referred to. Nor do we think that the fact that they hold under the maliks the land in suit makes it incumbent upon the plaintiffs to make them parties inasmuch as the plaintiffs have come to Court on the allegation that they have been in the enjoyment of the right claimed with the consent of the maliks. Moreover, it does not lie in the mouth of the defendants to take this objection as, according to their case with which they have come to Court the lands in suit do not belong to any one except themselves. The learned Subordinate Judge seems to think that the right of pasturage is an encroachment upon the right of ownership of the land, that in such suits the landlords must be made parties and that the absence of the landlords is fatal to the suits. This, in our opinion, is not the correct view. In the special circumstances of the case this question hardly arises. The parties joined issues on the existence of the right of pasturage and the plaintiffs said that the property appertained to a certain taluk. But for their purpose it did not matter to which taluk it did appertain so long as the right of pasturage was declared. The defendants, on the other hand, claimed the land in dispute as appertaining to their homestead and not to the taluk over which the plaintiffs claim the right of pasturage. Now, if effect is given to the view taken by the lower appellate Court and the maliks are brought on the record as defendants, and if the maliks come and say that they have no objection or that they never objected to the plaintiffs exercising or enjoying the right of pasturage over the land they must be relieved from the suit: and we do not know who would be responsible for their costs. A suit must be determined under O. 1, R. 9, Civil P. C., according to the relief claimed as between the parties to the suit. To suppose that the execution of the decree against any party to the suit may be obstructed by certain persons interested in the property is to indulge in speculations. If the plaintiffs get a decree against the contesting defendant in this suit and if at the time of enforcement of the decree they are obstructed by the maliks or anybody else, then there would be a fresh cause of action against such persons. But the suit, as at present constituted, does not disclose any cause of action against the owners or against any person interested in the land in suit. In this view the question for decision in the case of Haran Sherkh v. Ramesh Chandra Bhat-tacharjee (1), or in the case of Surja Narain Bera v. Chandra Bera (2), upon which the lower appellate Court relied does not arise. If it was necessary to consider those decisions we would not be inclined to hold that in the present suit any person other than those who objected to the plaintiffs' right of enjoyment was a necessary party.

As the result of the above considerations this appeal must succeed. The decree of the lower appellate Court is set aside and the case sent back to that Court for trial on the other issues. The appellants are entitled to their costs in this appeal. The costs of the lower Courts will abide the result.

Cri. Revn. No. 860 of 1926, Decided on 8th September 1926, from the order of the Sessions Judge, Rungpore, D/- 9th August 1926.

Criminal P. C., Ss. 200 and 202—It is necessary for the Magistrate to pass order on the police report under S. 203 or S. 204 when he takes cognizance of a complaint and examines the complainant and orders a police enquiry under S. 202

When a Magistrate takes cognizance of a complaint under S. 190 (1) (a) and examines the complainant under S. 200 and orders a police inquiry under S. 202, it is for him to pass the necessary order on the police report either under S. 203 or S. 204. His order directing the police to submit charge-sheet to some other Magistrate is without jurisdiction. [P 25 C 2]

H. C. Guha, A. K. Fazlul Huq and Jnan Chandar Roy—for Petitioners.

Khundkar—for the Crown.

Duval, J.—In this matter a complaint was lodged before the District Magistrate of Rungpore on the 16th February 1926, against certain people of charges under S. 366, I. P. C., and other sections. The complainant was examined on oath, as provided for in S. 200, Criminal P. C., and the Magistrate then passed an order sending the case to the police for inquiry, but adding:

The police will see if there is any evidence for the submission of a charge-sheet, and after that they will send it to the Magistrate concerned.

As a matter of fact it appears that the alleged place of occurrence was within Nilphamari, a sub-division of the Rungpore District. An inquiry was made by the police, and, on the 3rd May, a charge-sheet was submitted to the Sub-divisional Officer of Nilphamari, who thereupon issued a warrant for the arrest of certain accused persons. Certain of the accused subsequently surrendered, and then an application was made to the Sessions Judge to refer the matter to this Court for quashing of the whole proceedings. The Sessions Judge, however, refused to refer the matter to this Court, and this rule was then obtained from this Court why the proceedings should not be quashed on the grounds (1) that the procedure adopted by the District Magistrate is wrong, inasmuch as he acted under Chap. 16, Criminal P. C., and then proceeded under Chap. 14, Criminal P. C., (2) that, after having taken cognizance of the case under S. 190, Cl. (a), and proceeded under S. 200, the learned Magistrate had no power to act under S. 156 (3); (3) that his action in directing the police to submit a charge-sheet is illegal and without jurisdiction; (4) that the Sub-divisional Magistrate of Nilphamari has no jurisdiction, unless the case is transferred to him according to the provisions of law.

Now the facts seem to be clear; the Magistrate took cognizance of a complaint under S. 200, Criminal P. C., and it would appear that he referred the case to the police for inquiry under his power to do so under S. 202, Criminal P. C., but in giving that order he did not observe that it was for him to pass the necessary order on the police report either under S. 203 or S. 204. His order, therefore, directing the police, if they found the case to be established, to submit charge-sheet to the Magistrate concerned (in this case the Sub-divisional Officer of Nilphamari) appears to us to have been without jurisdiction. We do not think that S. 156 (3) can have any application to the case before us. The Magistrate had certainly taken cognizance of the case under S. 200, and it appears to us that this section only empowers the Magistrate to order a police inquiry in a case when the Magistrate does not himself issue process at once. It seems, therefore, that the whole of the proceedings of the Sub-divisional Officer, Nilphamari, accepting the charge-sheet and proceeding with the case, without any order by the District Magistrate under S. 204, Criminal P. C., or any order of transfer of the case to him under S. 192 are without jurisdiction and must be set aside. We, accordingly, set these orders aside, and send the proceeding back to the District Magistrate of Rangpore who will now under S. 203 or S. 204 pass the necessary orders on the police inquiry which has taken place; and if he so thinks he may issue processes and transfer the case to the Sub-divisional Officer for trial or inquiry.

The rule is made absolute to the extent only that the later orders are set aside. The order of the District Magistrate taking cognizance will remain, and he will now pass orders in the manner directed above.

Chotzner, J.—I agree.

Appeal No. 162 of 1927, Decided on 19th July 1927.

Civil P. C., O. 43, R. 1—Order dismissing application to set aside sale merely for non-appearance of the applicant is appealable—Civil P. C., O. 21, R. 90.

Where a person applies under O. 21, R. 90 but the application is dismissed for his non-appearance, and the opposite party is present and ready to contest, the order dismissing the application is an order under O. 43, R. 1 (j) and is, therefore, appealable: A. I. R. 1926 Cal 773, Discussed. [P 26 C 2]

Nasim Ali—for Appellant.

Santosh Kumar Pal and Sukumar Hazra—for Respondent.

Page, J.—This is an appeal against two orders passed by the learned Subordinate Judge of Howrah on the 18th December 1926, by one of which the learned Judge dismissed the judgment-debtor's application for an order setting aside an execution sale under O. 21, R. 90, and by the other he confirmed the sale. Now, the order dismissing the judgment-debtor's application to set aside the sale was passed upon the application of the opposite party who was present, and urged that the application should be dismissed because neither the applicant nor any pleader on his behalf was present to support it when called for hearing.

A preliminary objection was taken to the competency of this appeal upon the ground that the order dismissing the judgment-debtor's application to set aside a sale under O. 21, R. 90 was not an order under O. 21, R. 92, "refusing to set aside a sale," and, therefore, was not within O. 43, R. 1 (j). In my opinion, the preliminary objection fails. In Basarattullah Mean v Reazuddin Mean (1). I ventured to observe that :

I am disposed to think that an order dismissing an application to set aside a sale merely on default of appearance of the parties cannot be regarded as in any way confirming the sale. No doubt, if the Court not only dismisses the application but orders that the sale be confirmed, such an order is within R. 92, and is appealable under O. 43, R. 1 (j). On the other hand, in dismissing the application for default, when neither party appears on the case being called for hearing, the Court does not refuse to set aside the sale, but in the absence of the parties refuses to consider whether the sale should be set aside or not. Such an order, in my opinion, is not appealable under O. 43, R. 1 (j). Whether an appeal lies from an order or not in each case must depend upon the construction of the order. In my opinion, where an order is passed dismissing an application to set aside a sale merely on default of appearance by the parties and not on the merits the applicant is not debarred from making a fresh application for the same purpose, if he prefers the application within the time allowed by the statute of limitation, and the application otherwise is duly made according to the requirements of the law.

The position is entirely different where the application under O. 21, R. 90, is dismissed either on the merits, or when the applicant does not appear but the opposite party appears and is ready to contest the application. In either of those circumstances in my opinion, the order dismissing the application to set aside a sale is an order refusing to set aside a sale within O. 43, R. 1 (j) and in either case the order confirming the sale under O. 21, R. 92 is ancillary to and follows as of course from the order dismissing the application to set the sale aside. In my opinion, the orders of the 18th December 1926, by which the application to set aside the sale was dismissed and the sale was confirmed were subject to appeal. Upon the merits, in our opinion, the appeal must succeed. It appears that the applicant was desirous of summoning four witnesses in support of his application under O. 21, R. 90, and deposited diet money sufficient for the purpose. One of the witnesses was duly summoned and accepted the diet money; another refused to accept the diet money, and the remaining two were not served. Subsequently, on the 13th November an order was passed that fresh summons should be issued to the witnesses for the applicant and the hearing of the execution case was adjourned till the 4th December. On the 4th December the applicant presented a petition praying that fresh summonses should be issued to the two witnesses whom hitherto he had been unable to serve, but the Court rejected his petition upon the ground that no requisites had been filed and the parties were directed to be ready for the hearing on the 18th December.

On that day a petition was presented by a pleader on behalf of the applicant praying that the fresh summonses should be issued upon the two witnesses whose names were mentioned in the petition and that there should be an adjournment of the hearing. In his petition the applicant stated that the diet money for these witnesses was on deposit in this Court. That was the fact. Nevertheless, the learned Subordinate Judge passed the following order :

I do not find any sufficient reason to issue summons upon the applicant's witnesses at this late stage, particularly when diet money for the witnesses is not filed and the opposite party is ready with his many witnesses. The petition appears to be frivolous and no pleader appears to support it. Petition is rejected.

Now, it appears that on that morning, after the pleader had lodged his petition during the first hour of the sitting of the Court, he left the Court as the petition could not be heard forthwith, and did not return to the Court until after the mid-day adjournment, when it was discovered that one of the orders under appeal had been passed in the following terms :

The applicant does not appear though repeatedly called. His pleader is also absent. Case be dismissed with costs. Pleader's fees Rs. 4.

And this order was followed by the other order under review :

Thirty days having expired from the date of sale and the objection having been disallowed, ordered that the sale be confirmed and the execution case be dismissed on part satisfaction.

There can be no doubt, having regard to the course of the proceedings, that the learned Judge refused the petition for an adjournment and fresh service because he came to the conclusion that as no diet money had been duly deposited the applicant was not bona fide prosecuting application. But it now transpires that the diet money had all along been on deposit in Court, and in the circumstances obtaining in this case I do not think that the application ought to have been rejected. At the same time if the applicant or his pleader had remained in Court on the 18th December, and had explained what the real position was, in all probability these proceedings would not have been necessary.

The order of the Court is that the appellant must deposit in the executing Court the respondent's costs incidental to both this appeal and the Miscellaneous Case No. 45 of 1926 within one week from the date of the order assessing the costs in the lower Court. The costs in the lower Court are to be assessed within one week after the arrival of the records and this order in the lower Court. We assess the hearing-fee in this Court at two gold mohurs.

If the costs as aforesaid are deposited in the Court below as directed above the appeal will be allowed and the orders under appeal set aside, and the application of the appellant under O. 21, R. 90 heard according to law. If the said costs are not deposited as aforesaid the appeal will stand dismissed with costs, the hearing-fee being assessed at two gold mohurs.

Graham, J.—I agree.

* (a) Criminal P. C., S. 360 (3)—Witness deposing in vernacular—Deposition recorded in English—It need not be read over to him in English before interpreting in vernacular.

Sub-Section 360 does not require that the deposition recorded in English should be translated into the vernacular to a witness who has deposed in the vernacular, after having first been read over to him in English. If such had been the intention of the Legislature, one would have expected the word "also" to stand between the words "shall" and "be interpreted" in sub-S. (3). [P 31 C 2]

Mrityunjoy Chattopadhyaya—for Appellants

B. L. Mitter—for the Crown

Cammiade, J.—These four appeals are against a judgment of commissioners appointed under sub-Ss (1) and (2) S. 4, Bengal Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1925. Nine persons were convicted by this judgment; and out of these one has undergone sentence of death passed on him in connexion with the Alipore Jail murder. There remain eight persons. Five of them, namely Hari Narayan Chandra, Rajendra Lal Lahiri, Birendra Kumar Banerjee, Dhruvesh Chandra Chatterjee and Rakhal Chandra De are the appellants in appeal No. 89; Nikhil Bandhu Banerjee is the appellant in appeal No. 90; Debi Prasad Chatterjee is the appellant in appeal No. 91; and Shibaram Chatterjee is the appellant in appeal No. 99. Two of the appellants in the first of these appeals, namely Dhruvesh Chandra Chatterjee and Rakhal Chandra De, have been sentenced to transportation for life in connexion with the Alipore Jail murder; and the learned vakil who appears for them has moved us to exercise the powers vested in us by S. 397, Criminal P. C., and make the sentence passed in the case before us run concurrently with the other sentence, in the event of our finding these appellants guilty in the present case also. The learned Advocate-General has supported this request. This appeal in other respects, as far as these appellants are concerned, may be treated as sentimental.

All the appellants have been found guilty of the following offences, namely conspiracy, under S. 120B, I. P. C., to commit the offences specified in S. 4(b), Explosive Substances Act, and S. 19(f) Arms Act, and also substantive offences under both the last-mentioned sections. Hari Narayan Chandra and Rajendra Lal Lahiri have been sentenced to transportation for ten years under S. 4(b), Explosive Substances Act, and to rigorous imprisonment for two years under S. 19(f), Arms Act. Birendra Kumar Banerjee, Nikhil Bandhu Banerjee, Dhruvesh Chandra Chatterjee and Rakhal Chandra De have been sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for five years under the former section and rigorous imprisonment for two years under the latter. Shibaram Chatterjee and Debi Prasad Chatterjee have been sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for three years and 18 months respectively under the above two sections. The separate sentences passed on each of the appellants are to run concurrently.

The story of the case is to the following effect:

The police had been keeping watch over the house, No. 4 Sovabazar Street; and instructions had been given to shadow Ananta Hari Mitra. On the 6th November 1925, a watcher named Nalini Kanta Roy, who was standing at the junction of Sovabazar Street and Chitpore Road, saw Ananta Hari Mitra engage a taxi at about 1.45 p. m. and drive into Sovabazar Street. After a few minutes he saw the same taxi returning with Ananta Hari Mitra, Dhruvesh Chandra Chatterjee and another man inside. The taxi turned into Chitpore Road and went northwards. The watcher took down the number of the taxi.

That evening, at about 6 o'clock, the watcher came across the taxi and asked the driver where he had taken the three young men. The driver, whose name was Hiru, replied that he had driven them as far as Baranagore Bazar where they had alighted and engaged a ticca gharri. On being asked if he could point out the ticca gharri, he said he might, and also that his friend, Shamser Ali, who had been with him, might also help in the matter. The watcher went with Hiru to Shamser Ali's house. They took Shamser with them in the taxi to Baranagore Bazar. There Hiru and Shamser made enquiries among the ticca gharri drivers and returned and said that the man who had driven the young men was one Mona, who was not there at the moment. Next morning, the watcher went to Baranagore and found Mona, from whom he learnt that he had driven the three young men to Bachaspatipara in Dakhineswar. The watcher made Mona drive him to the place where the young men had alighted. There Mona pointed out the house to which one of the young men had gone to get change for a rupee, while the other two had remained in the carriage. That house is the one referred to in the evidence as Dwaraka's house.

Early on the morning of the 10th November, Mr. Duckfield, Additional Superintendent of Police, 24-Parganas, went with a posse of police to make a search. He was taken by Nalini Kanta Roy, the watcher, to Dwaraka's house. That house is in two parts. The house was surrounded; and at each of the parts of the house one of the inmates was questioned. It was ascertained from them that the next house, separated from this one by a tank, was occupied by strangers, who kept very much to themselves. Mr. Duckfield inferred that that was the house he wanted; and he had it surrounded. One search witness was taken on the way to the place, at a distance of about half a mile from the house that was searched; and three neighbours were also summoned and made to attend as witnesses to the search. All the nine persons who have been convicted were found at the house that was searched. The police found the door closed, and they knocked for admittance. Rakhai Chandra De opened the door and stood in the doorway and Mr. Duckfield asked him his name: and he gave the name of Nimai Chandra Deb. Rakhai was put under arrest. As the rooms on the ground floor were unoccupied, Mr. Duckfield went up the stairs, followed by some of the members of his force. He found the door at the head of the stair closed and fastened. As no one complied with the request that that door should be opened, a pick-axe was procured, and the door was broken open.

On the first floor of the house there are three rooms and an enclosed verandah. The house faces south; and the enclosed verandah is on the south side. As one goes up the stairs, one finds to the left a door leading off the enclosed verandah into the room that is referred to as the eastern room. On the right-hand side as one goes up, there is the enclosed verandah, out of which two doors open northwards into the rooms which are referred to as the middle room and the western room. When Mr. Duckfield entered the enclosed verandah he found Rajendra Lal Lahiri at the foot of the flight of stairs leading to the roof, which lie between the stairs that lead to the ground floor and the eastern room. Mr. Duckfield arrested Rajendra Lal Lahiri, and sent him downstairs. Mr. Duckfield then went into the middle room. There he found Dhrubesh Chatterjee and Shibaram Chatterjee lying ill, with Ananta Hari Mitra attending to them. The last named was put under arrest.

Mr. Duckfield then went to the eastern room. On the way there, he found Debi Prosad Chatterjee under arrest in the enclosed verandah. The latter had been in attendance on the three persons who were lying ill in the eastern room. Those three persons were Birendra Kumar Banerjee, Hari Narayan Chandra and Nikhil Bandhu Banerjee. None of the persons found upstairs gave his name, with the exception of Debi Prosad who also gave his father's name, and address. The eastern room was searched first. The articles found there were items 1 to 46 of search list Ex. B. The search of that room lasted till about 9-30 a. m. At about 9 o'clock, the five persons who were ill were sent in an ambulance and in a taxi to Alipore, to be produced before the District Magistrate.

The search of the middle room was taken up after that of the eastern room was concluded. In the middle room, amongst other things, there was an almirah which was padlocked. Those of the arrested persons who had been brought up and were present were called upon to produce the key. As the key was not produced, the padlock was forced open. In that almira were found most of the remaining articles specified in search list Ex. B. including, among other things, a live bomb. The Chief Inspector of Explosives was sent for; and he placed the bomb in a bucket of water, and took it away. The search of the premises was continued till 7-30 p. m. on that day and was continued on the next two days. Nothing of any importance was found in the western room upstairs, in the room on the roof, in the ground floor rooms or in the out-houses. The four accused persons in good health were present throughout the search of the middle and western room and were there for the rest of the day. They were produced before the Magistrate next morning.

Before proceeding to discuss the case on the merits, it is necessary to dispose of a preliminary objection to the validity of the trial, taken on behalf of all the appellants. It is contended that the provisions of S. 360, Criminal P. C. have not been complied with. Our attention is drawn to the fact that the certificates given by the commissioners at the foot of the depositions are in four different forms:

(1) "Read over to witness in the presence of the accused or their lawyers, and admitted to be correct.

(2) Read over in the presence of the accused and admitted to be correct.

(3) Explained to the witness in the presence of the accused or their lawyers and admitted to be correct.

(4) Explained to the witness in the presence of the accused and admitted to be correct.

It is contended that only the second of these forms of certificates shows compliance with provisions of S. 360. As regards the reading over of the depositions in the presence of the lawyers representing accused persons, who were temporarily absent from the Court-room for necessary purposes at the time the depositions were read over (certificate form No. 1 above) it is urged that such reading over is not a compliance with the provisions of the section, the object of which is to enable both the witness and the accused to see whether or not the depositions have been correctly recorded.*

As regards the certificates in forms Nos. (3) and (4) set forth above, it is contended that, in order to comply with the provisions of S. 360, it is the duty of the Court first to read over the recorded deposition in English, as provided in sub-S. (1) and then to have it interpreted to the witness as provided in sub-S. (3), and that as the certificate does not show that the deposition, where certificate in form No. 3 or No. 4 has been given, was read over in English, there was no compliance with the requirements of the section.

Before proceeding to discuss this matter it should be stated that all the accused persons under trial were represented by lawyers. Throughout the trial, all the accused persons were represented by a Solicitor named Delip Kumar Chakrabarti, witness 74 for the prosecution. Besides this, for the first five days of the trial, the appellant Nikhil was represented by a Mr. Mukherji and certain other legal gentlemen who appeared also for other accused persons. On the sixth day of the trial Mr. Mukherji and these other legal gentlemen made known to the Court that from that day forward they ceased to appear for Nikhil. All the accused persons admittedly knew English.

Two affidavits have been filed on behalf of the appellants, one by one Krishna Charan Chandra, brother of the appellant Hari Narayan Chandra, and the other by one Akhil Bandhu Banerjee, brother of the appellant Nikhil Bandhu Banerjee. On the side of the Crown, a statement signed by one of the commissioners, contradicting the allegations made in these affidavits, has been filed. In the first of these affidavits the commissioners are charged with having merely told some of the witnesses what purported to be the substance of the depositions that had been recorded; and it is further stated that all the accused persons were not present in the Court-room at the time that some of the depositions were read over. The other affidavit states that Nikhil was not present in the Court-room when some of the depositions were either read over or explained to the witnesses. The deponent states that he particularly remembers that Nikhil was absent from the Court-room when the deposition given by Jugal Kishore was explained to that witness. He further repeats the charge that in the case of some of the witnesses only the substance of their depositions was given to them in Bengali.

The commissioners' statement is to the effect that, whenever a witness deposed in English the deposition was read over to him in English, that whenever a witness deposed in the vernacular, the deposition was read over sentence by sentence and then explained to the witness in the vernacular, and that if any accused person not represented by a lawyer was absent from the Court-room, the Court invariably waited for his return before proceeding to read out the deposition to the witness.

The learned vakil appearing for the appellants were none of them present at the trial, and are not in a position to support the allegations made in the affidavits. None of the legal gentlemen who did appear for the appellants at the trial has sworn an affidavit to support the allegations that have been made. The persons who have sworn the affidavits are the brothers of two of the appellants who have nothing to lose by swearing falsely. The allegations made by them are amply refuted by the statement signed by one of the commissioners. The very record shows with what care and scruple the commissioners did their work. The commissioners have been at pains to record in each instance whether or not all the accused persons were themselves present in the Court-room at the time a deposition was read over, showing that they made a point of ascertaining each time whether or not all the accused persons were present in the room when depositions were read over. There can, therefore, be no doubt that whenever Nikhil, who was considered unrepresented, was out of the room, the Court did, as the commissioner has stated, await his return before reading over a deposition.

We are not prepared to accept the contention that sub-S. (3), S. 360 is an additional provision, requiring that the deposition recorded in English should be translated into the vernacular to a witness who has deposed in the vernacular, after having first been read over to him in English. It would be a grave insult to the Court to question its integrity in giving a true rendering in the vernacular of the deposition it has recorded. There is nothing in the wording of the section to indicate that it requires that the deposition shall first be read over as recorded in English and shall then be translated into the language in which the witness has deposed. If such had been the intention of the legislature, we should have expected the word "also" to stand between the words "shall" and "be interpreted" in sub-S. (3). It is, however, not necessary for us on this occasion to decide whether or not the interpretation sought to be put upon the section is correct, as the commissioner who has made a statement has placed on record that whenever a witness deposed in the vernacular, the deposition recorded in English was first read out sentence by sentence and then interpreted to the witness.

As regards the objection that the reading over of a deposition in the presence of a pleader, during the temporary absence of the prisoner represented by such pleader, is not a compliance with the provisions of S. 360, we have been referred to the case of Kasim Ali v. Sarada Kripa Laha (1) and also to the wording of Ss 360 and 361 of the Code. It is true that in the case referred to we find that a Bench of this Court laid down as follows :

It is clear from the wording of the section that if the accused is in attendance the evidence must be read over in his presence, and it is only when the accused appears by pleader that the reading over of the evidence in the presence of the accused's pleader is sufficient.

But the facts of the case do not appear from the report. It may be inferred that in that case the deposition had been read over before a pleader and that is all. There may have been more than one accused person in the case; and possibly the person in whose absence the deposition in that case was read over had no pleader appearing for him. We, therefore, cannot consider the case as an authority for the proposition set up by the appellants.

As regards the argument based on the wording of the sections, we are unable to accept the contentions of the appellants. The contentions are as follows :

Firstly, that the words in sub-S. (1), S. 360, or of his pleader, if he appears by pleader relate to cases where the personal attendance of an accused person is dispensed with under the provisions of S. 205 of the Code in which the words permit him to appear by pleader are to be found, and secondly that such interpretation is borne out by the provisions of S. 361, of which the first two sub-sections read :

Sub-S. (1) : Whenever any evidence is given in a language not understood by the accused, and he is present in person, it shall be interpreted to him in open Court in a language understood by him.

Sub-S (2): If he appears by pleader and the evidence is given in a language other than that of the Court and not understood by the pleader, it shall be interpreted to the pleader in that language.

Now, the words "appear by pleader" are nowhere defined. In ordinary acceptance, these words mean "represented by pleader," that is to say, having a pleader to act and plead. In S. 205 the word "appear" seems to convey a double meaning, seemingly connoting not merely authority to act and plead, but also authority to personate the accused; but there is nothing to show that double meaning was intended by the legislature. It is necessary that someone should be present at the trial to look after the interests of the accused; and all that S. 205 provides is that, when the Magistrate sees fit, a person against whom a summons has issued may be exempted from personal appearance, provided he engages a pleader to attend and see that the proceedings are properly and legally conducted. The law considers that the interests of the accused will be completely safeguarded if his pleader is in attendance. This is all that can be gathered from the provisions of that section. A similar intention is to be gathered from the provisions of S. 361.

But even if the double meaning of the word "appear" in S. 205 were intentional, there is nothing in the provisions of sub-S. (1), S. 360 to indicate that the legislature intended that the reading over in the presence of the pleader should be a compliance with the provisions of that section only in cases where the personal appearance of the accused is dispensed with by the Court. The words used are:

It shall be read over to him (the witness) in the presence of the accused, if in attendance, or of his pleader, if he appears by pleader.

The natural meaning of these words is that if an accused person has engaged a pleader, who is in attendance, the reading over of the deposition in the presence of the pleader will be a full compliance with the provisions of the section, if the accused himself does not happen to be present at the time the deposition is read over. We, therefore, hold that the provisions of S. 360 have been complied with.

Turning to the facts of the case: we find a number of young men, not all of one caste, hailing from different places, none of them with any ostensible means of livelihood, and only one of them apparently possessing some money, living together in what is practically a village on the outskirts of Calcutta, a place which is admittedly malarious. These young men keep very much to themselves. They hardly go abroad and even will not make use of the privy standing within the compound of the house, using instead a rain-water pipe leading from the roof of the house. They have no intercourse with neighbours. They keep their door closed all the time. When one of them visits the grocer's shop to buy groceries, he does so late in the evening and tells the grocer to make haste and hand over the goods. They live under assumed names. Even when some of them are ill, rather than call local medical men, they go to the expense of bringing one from a distance, paying him a high fee and the expenses of conveying him to Dakhineswar and back. At the search of the house they occupy, the police found a stolen revolver, a muzzle-loading pistol, cartridges for revolvers, for an automatic pistol and for a shotgun, a live bomb, a large quantity of chemicals used in the preparation of explosives, hand-written and type-written instructions for the preparation of explosives of various kinds, cloth masks, written instructions about disguises, inflammatory literature and have hand-drawn maps of the neighbourhood.

All these young men profess to have no connexion with the incriminating articles found at the search. Every one of them, except Nikhil, who made no statement, gives some excuse for being in that house. Hari Narayan says that he is an ex-internee, and that as the police were always on his tracks he decided to live in a quiet place outside Calcutta. He came to hear of the house at Dakhineswar through his friend Dhrubesh, and took it at the beginning of August, and went to live there with Birendra and Shibaram. Birendra says that the people of the house where he had worked as a private tutor in Howrah had calumniated him and that he had to leave Howrah on that account. His friend, Hari Narayan, suggested living at Dakhineswar; and he went there to live with his friend, who also promised to take him into partnership in a business he was going to start. Birendra, however, was ill most of the time.

Shibaram says he had quarrelled with a professor of Ashutosh College and had gone to St. Xavier's College, against his father's wishes. He failed in his annual examination; and his father expressed annoyance at this. He, therefore, left home. His friend, Hari Narayan, took him to live at Dakshineswar to save him expense and also promised to have him instructed in short hand. Dhrubesh says he had a quarrel with his uncle over money matters and left home and lived at one or two places and then went to the Dakshineswar house, where his friends had started a cheap mess. Rakhal De had a quarrel with the manager of a business called the Chittagong Chemical Industries, for which he had been working. He was on the look-out for other employment and wrote to his friend, Ananta Hari Mitra, who invited him from Chittagong to Krishnagar and then took him to live at Dakshineswar early in November.

Rajendra Lahiri, Debi Prosad and Ananta Hari say they went to the house on the 8th November, two days before their arrest, and found several people lying ill. They were asked to stay and help; and that is how they happened to be present at the time of the search. Rajendra claims to have come to know of the place through his friend Dhrubesh, whom he had met near the Dakshineswar temple, and had been invited to go and visit the mess whenever he could. Devi Prosad also had quarrels. He had formerly lived at the house in Dakshineswar in which he has a share. As he had quarrelled with his co-sharers he had gone to live at Bally, on the other side of the river. The letting of the house to Hari Narayan and his friends was arranged through him, but his relatives tried to deprive him of his share of the rent. He, therefore, went to the house on the 8th November to collect his share of the rent direct.

That the incriminating articles were found in the house and that all the appellants were arrested there on the 10th November 1925 are not questioned. The case sought to be set up for all the appellants is that they had no connexion with the incriminating articles, and that those articles must have been introduced into the house by the police; and if that theory is not accepted, it has not been proved which of the appellants was in possession of the incriminating articles.

As regards individual appellants, it is urged that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it should be believed that Rajendra and Debi did not go to the house till the 8th November, and that their purpose in staying there was merely to help in nursing people who were ill. For Shibaram it is said that he was too ill to know what was taking place in the house.

Touching the first part of the general defence set up in argument before us, it has been urged that firstly the search was not conducted in accordance with law; and secondly that, as Mr. Duckfield has said that the appellants who were in good health were brought up from downstairs when the middle room was searched, that is to say at 9-30, and the men who were ill were removed at 9 o'clock, the police had had half-an hour in which to "plant" the incriminating articles in the middle room. At the time of the trial, the suggestion that was thrown out was that the things had been carried into the house before the arrival of the local search witnesses. This suggestion will appear only from the following passage in the deposition of the friendly search witness Makhan Lal Chatterji, P. W. 5, who is related to the appellant Debi Prosad. The question put to this witness was:

Had you any conversation with the accused there.

("There" refers to the door of the house, where according to the witness he found Rajendra and Debi under arrest).

I shall recall it to you. Did the accused say this. "Mahashay, why have you come so late? They have done what they wanted to do."

And the answer was "yes."

From this it is argued that the suggestion then was that the incriminating articles were carried into the house by the police before Makhan's arrival. Yet neither Rajendra nor Debi said anything about this in his statement on examination before the commissioners. The learned vakil appearing for the appellants naively states that these persons could not make such statements in their answers to the commissioners, because they were downstairs and could not see the things being put into the almirah upstairs. They may or may not have been in a position to say that they saw things put into the almirah; but they must have been in a position to see things being taken upstairs. Considering the enormous number of articles taken at the search and the bulk of several of these articles, it certainly would have been impossible for the police to have taken these things upstairs without being seen. This matter will have to be referred to further in connexion with the comments that have been made about the searching of the persons of the police and of the search witnesses before they entered the house. The failure of the appellants to state that they saw articles in the hands of the police or indications that they were carrying articles concealed in their uniforms is a complete refutation of the suggestion that anything was carried into the house by the police at any time.

The enclosed verandah upstairs is only about five feet wide. According to the search witness Makhan the contents of a tin-box found in the eastern room were examined on that verandah. The officers conducting the search, some constables and the search witnesses were present. In such circumstances it is difficult to understand how it could have been possible for the police to carry to the middle room the large number of articles that were found there. If aspersions are made on the police, it should be shown that such aspersions are justifiable. It is not sufficient to say that on certain occasions the police have been known to fabricate circumstances. It must be shown that in the present case there are at least indications that the police put the incriminating articles into the house. The indications point the other way. When the key of the padlock to the almirah in the middle room was asked for, had those of the appellants who were present been innocent, one would have expected them to say;

How should we know where the key is? You have yourselves put the padlock on the almirah.

They would have made similar remarks when the incriminating articles were taken out of the almirah. Instead of which we find that when the bomb was found, the appellant Rajendra Lahiri offered to remove the fuse and make the bomb harmless.

Further, the nature of at least two of the articles makes it extremely improbable that the police had any connexion with them. The first is the bomb, which, as

Dr. Robson has deposed, was in a sensitive condition. He describes the mixture of chemicals contained in the bomb as a dangerous mixture and says that there is considerable probability of ammonium chlorate being formed from such a mixture, which might lead to a premature explosion. It is not reasonably probable that, in order to gain promotion or reward, the police would carry about on their persons such an extremely dangerous article as this bomb. The other item is the revolver. This weapon was unlicensed. Whenever that weapon might have been discovered by the police, the person with whom it was found would have been prosecuted. The weapon, moreover, is an expensive one; and it is unreasonable to suggest that subordinate members of the police establishment keep expensive weapons of this description by them for the purpose of "planting" them on persons whom they intend charging with possession of unlicensed arms. The suggestion that the police smuggled the incriminating articles into the house does not bear investigation.

In the same connexion the learned vakils for the appellants have drawn attention to certain discrepancies in the evidence on the subject of the searching of the persons of the police and of the search witnesses; they have characterized the search of the eastern room as illegal, because, according to Mr. Duckfield's evidence, the four men who were not ill were not present at that search; and they have asked us to disbelieve the evidence of the search on the ground that two of the search witnesses were not examined.

The witnesses agree in saying that the police were searched, although there are discrepancies concerning the manner in which they were searched. Some say hands were not laid on their persons; others say that the clothes were felt; and one police officer says that his pockets were searched. Mr. Duckfield offered himself for search and asked the search witnesses to search his force before he entered the house. As regards the search witnesses, they were four in number. Makhan was well disposed towards the appellants; and there is no suggestion that he took anything into the house. The other two witnesses to the search must also have been free from suspicion, since complaint is made that those persons were not placed in the witness-box. The suggestion, therefore, is that the remaining search witness, Jugal, must have smuggled things into the house. This is nothing but a suggestion. Suspicion is sought to be cast on Jugal because he was brought by the police from a distance of about half a mile from the place. This circumstance is not calculated to create any suspicion unless it can be shown that Jugal was in any way connected with the police. There is absolutely nothing to show this. The place where the house stands is more or less a village, well away from the Barrackpur Trunk Road. The house at which the police went to make the search was one near which it must be more or less difficult to secure persons to attend a search. It is not every one who is willing to be dragged into a police case. Therefore the mere fact that Jugal was found nearly half a mile away from the house that was searched is no ground for suspicion. There is also nothing reasonable about the suggestion. As already stated, the articles found were bulky. There were a great many bottles of acid, glycerine and other chemicals; there was glass apparatus of various kinds and a large number of small phials, packets containing different substances and papers, besides the bomb, the revolver, the pistol and the cartridges. It cannot be seriously suggested that Jugal Kishore could have smuggled any appreciable portion of this bulk. We are not told what clothes the man was wearing; and there is nothing to show that he wore any more clothing than Makan, who says he had on nothing more than a dhoti and a chadar. There is no force whatever in the suggestion that anything was smuggled into the house.

Nothing turns on the other two objections made concerning the search. With regard to the absence of Ananta Hari, Rajendra, Debi Prosad and Rukhal, the four persons who were in good health, at the time of the search of the eastern room, Mr. Duckfield may or may not be mistaken; but assuming that he is right in saying that all the four persons were downstairs when that room was searched, their absence can make no difference to the case. Our attention has been drawn to the remarks of Mr. Justice Beachcroft in the case of Ramesh Chandra Banerjee v. Emperor (2), where the learned Judge observes that in his opinion the spirit of S. 103, Criminal P. C. requires that the persons whose premises are searched shall be present and that he must be given the option of being present. This view of the meaning of the word "permitted" in sub-S. (3), S. 103 was not accepted by Mr. Justice Woodroffe, the other learned Judge who decided that case. We are not prepared to agree with the interpretation put on the word "permitted" by Mr. Justice Beachcroft.

As regards the failure of the prosecution to put the other two search witnesses into the witness-box, our attention has been drawn to the case of Munni Sonar v. Emperor (3), where it was laid down that every search witness should be put into the witness-box, unless the prosecution are of opinion that such persons would misrepresent facts and would mistate what had happened. With all the respect to the opinion of the learned Judges who decided that case, we must hold that no such duty is cast on the prosecution. Sub-section (2), S. 103 expressly lays down that no person witnessing a search under this section shall be required to attend the Court as a witness of the search unless specially summoned by it.

The reason of this provision is obvious. Many persons would be unwilling to attend searches if, as a matter of course they had to attend Court at the trial of the case, possibly two Courts, if the case is committed to the Sessions. The discretion is, therefore, left to the Court to require or not the attendance of such witnesses. It does not even appear that the appellants moved the commissioner to have those witnesses produced; and they certainly did not call them as witnesses for the defence, which it was open to them to do, and which they should have done, since they profess to have a high regard for the truthfulness of these persons. There is no substance in the grievance sought to be made out. Be those things as they may, the important question is whether or not the incriminating articles were in the house when the police went to search it. If this is so, as we must find it to be so, it would not matter in the least, whatever irregularities might have been committed in the conduct of the search.

The other important question in the case is the question of possession of the incriminating articles. At the trial, an attempt was made in cross-examination to suggest that the chemicals and the chemical apparatus were the property of a medical practitioner who had previously lived in the house. This suggestion has not been seriously pressed before us; and it is entirely negatived by the evidence. It appears that the medical practitioner who had occupied the house was one Govinda Gopal Mukherjee, Debi's maternal uncle. He had lived in the house for about twelve months and had been in the service of a neighbouring mill. He was away at his work the greater part of the day and had no private practice. He kept no chemicals in his house and had no laboratory. These facts are deposed to by Debi's relations, who are witnesses in the case. One of them, Nabin Kali, Debi's aunt, states that after the house had been let to the young men she had cleaned out the almirah in the middle room and left it open.

(2) [1913] 41 Cal. 350=23 I. C. 985=18 C. W. N. 493.

(3) [1901] 9 C. W. N. 438.

As far as concerns the bomb, there can be no question about its manufacture within a few days of the date of the search. There is unimpeachable proof that it was manufactured after the 23rd October 1925, because the circular slips of paper found within it, serving as a covering to the explosive powder, have been proved conclusively to have been cut out of the Amrita Bazar Patrika of that date.

A cash memo was also found among the papers in the house, showing purchase of extra pure nitric acid of the gravity of 1.42 on the 3rd November 1925, and among the bottles of acid found in the almirah was one such acid. The cash memo has been proved by the chemist who sold the acid. The purchaser had given the name of Asok Chandra Roy, being one of the names that one of the appellants had assumed. The address given to the chemist by the purchaser was 70 Balaram Ghose Street, a totally fictitious address. There is no room for the suggestion that the incriminating articles had belonged to the medical practitioner who had occupied the house. Possession of these articles can only be attributed to the occupants of the house at the time of the search. The only question is whether any of the persons found in the house can claim the benefit of the doubt in regard to this matter.

All the circumstances of the case leave no room for doubt that the occupants of the house were members of a conspiracy with anarchical designs. The persons found in the house belonged to different places: Hari Narayan belonged to Chinsurah; Biren to Salkia; Dhruv to Nandigram in the district of Hooghly; Nikhil to Joypur in the district of Jessore; Rakhal to Chittagong; Rajendra to Pabna; Ananta Hari to Krishnagar in the district of Nadia; Debi Prosad to Bally in the district of Howrah; and Shibaram to Bhowanipore, Calcutta. Some explanation is necessary for the presence of such persons in the same house several of them admittedly living together. The absence of explanation, which would be forthcoming if the appellants were innocent, undoubtedly corroborates the case for the prosecution. These young men, moreover, were doing nothing; and, according to their own account of themselves, the majority of them had quarrelled with their relations. They have none of them even stated that they had been making efforts to find employment. Only Birendra has said that he had had it in his mind to rejoin his appointment in the office of the E. I. Railway.

The fact that these young men were living in a place which is admittedly a hotbed of malaria does not suggest that they chose the place for the sake of their health. If they had been living honestly, there was no occasion for the extreme secrecy observed by them—secrecy carried to the point of making their lives disgusting. As already stated, these young men actually used a rain water pipe leading from the roof of the house as a latrine, when they had a privy outside. It is idle to say that people who do such a thing as this can have any but nefarious ways. Their only object in doing anything as disgusting could be to escape observation from neighbours. The inmates of the house went under false names. We have nothing but the statements of the majority of them that for one reason or another they had fallen out with their relatives and guardians and that they did not wish to be traced by them. This story is not consistent with the story that Rajendra who is supposed to have become stranger to the bulk of the occupants of the house, was invited to visit the house as often as he could go, or that Ananta Hari, a person who is said to have had no sort of connexion with the establishment, took Rakhal to live there as a matter of course. -We have nothing but the word of the appellants about the reasons for their being where they were found, with all the incriminating articles. People living in the house were collecting materials for the manufacture of explosives, had in their possession directions for the preparation of explosives of various kinds and at least one live bomb and also unlicensed arms. That persons who were engaged in doing such things would have as their mess mates any but fellow conspirators is utterly inconceivable. It cannot be believed that any person could have been admitted within the house unless he was a safe person. Since the occupiers of the house would not even associate with neighbours in the street and were so careful about avoiding even being seen by their neighbours, it is utterly unlikely that they would admit people within the house, least of all have people to stay with them, unless such people were co-conspirators.

Of the co-owners of the house, Hari Sadhan Chatterjee, Satish Chandra Chatterjee and Nabin Kali, each was admitted upstairs once. On the occasion of their visits, they found the door of the house closed and had to knock for admittance. Satish visited the house in the first part of August, and Hari Sadhan visited it in the first week of September. They went there to collect the rent. Nabin Kali went to the house on four or five occasions. She used to go to the garden to collect bel leaves for worship. She used to find even the door of the outer wall of the house fastened and had to shout for admittance. She went upstairs once. That was at the time of the Ananta Chaturdashi in the month of Bhadra (end of August). That was the occasion on which she cleaned out the almirah in the middle room. It does not appear that any of the co-owners of the house went there after the first week in September; and we find that Debi paid the rent to Hari Sadhan at the beginning of November.

Whether or not chemicals for the manufacture of explosives had been introduced into the house before the end of the first week of September, it is impossible to say. There is one circumstance that seems to indicate that they had not, namely that apparently the house was not occupied during the Durga Puja festivities, which occurred in that year between the 24th and the 27th September. Nabin Kali states that the boys told her they were going home for the puja and would lock up the house. During the Puja festivities she noticed that the door of the house was padlocked. Three days after the puja she noticed that the door was still padlocked, and it seemed to her that there was no one in the house. The real activities of the conspirators seem to have started after the Puja. There is no definite evidence of this. The only circumstances that seem to indicate this are the one stated above, the manufacture of the bomb subsequent to the 23rd October, the apparent purchase of nitric acid on 3rd November, as evidenced by the voucher found in the house, and the increase in the number in the house.

Over and above the grave improbability that any persons other than fellow conspirators would have been admitted into the house when the conspirators had become active, there is the want of plausible explanation of the presence of the persons who were admitted there after the Puja, and there is the further fact that the prosecution has established a connexion between the house at Dakshineswar and 4 Sova Bazar Street, the house that Ananta Hari Mitra used to frequent. That house also was searched on the 10th November, and amongst the things found there were a five chambered revolver with cartridges, six large bottles of nitric acid and inflammatory literature. A bicycle was found at that house; and the bill for repairs done to that bicycle was found in the almirah in the middle room of the Dakshineswar house, and has been proved by the owner of the shop where the repairs were done. The established connexion with 4 Sova Bazar Street and the repeated appearance in the accounts found in the almirah of mysterious names, including the assumed names of some of the persons found in the Dakshineswar house, prove that the establishment at Dakshineswar was a branch of a larger organization; and this fact makes it all the more impossible to believe that the conspirators at work at Dakshineswar would admit within their house any but persons who were members of the conspiracy.

found in the house, and as the circumstances point to the conclusion that every person found in the house was a member of the conspiracy, absence of proof that a particular person was there innocently leads to the conclusion that no one's presence was innocent. The explanation offered on behalf of Rajendra is palpably false. The improbability of persons who kept themselves so very much concealed as the inmates of the house inviting people to go and visit them has already been noticed. But, apart from this, we have clear indications that Rajendra had been in the house for some time and had not, as he says, only gone there on the 8th November. He stated that, because he knew he could have to stay with the sick persons for a day or two, he went away and fetched a cloth, a chadar and Bryce's Democracy. At the search of the house at Dakshineswar, various articles were found which he claimed as his own—shaving materials, a blanket, a panjabi and other things. His admitted belongings were found in various parts of the house. Over and above this, we find that his panjabi bore the arrow mark, which the dhobi who had washed the clothing of the inmates of that house had been putting on those clothes. The dhobi has also identified Rajendra as one of the persons whom he saw at the house when he went there in connexion with the washing of clothes. The dhobi says he was not allowed to enter the house, and that the clothes used to be thrown to him from upstairs.

The only appellants besides Rajendra who claim to have been recent arrivals are Rakhal and Debi Prosad. The former, as already stated, had come from Chittagong. The fact that according to his own case he was introduced to the establishment by Ananta Hari Mitra, who was connected both with this establishment and the one at 4 Sova Bazar Street makes it all the more necessary that he should prove his statements. There is nothing but his own uncorroborated statement to show that he was a recent arrival. But, even if he was a recent arrival, the inferences arising from the facts of the case have to be rebutted; and there is absolutely nothing to rebut them.

As regards Debi Prosad, it may be said that he was co-owner of the house and had occasion to go to there to collect rent. There really appears to have been no reason why he should have collected his share of the rent for himself as his uncle Hari Sadhan, and his cousin, Satish, who lived close by could have collected it. Both these men have said that there was no quarrel between them and Debi Prosad. They admit that they wished to have the family properties partitioned, and that Hari Sadhan had caused notice to be served on Debi to that effect through a pleader. Nabin Kali states that Hari Sadhan had wished to apply the rent of the house towards repairs. It is possible that if there was a difference of opinion between Debi and his uncle on that matter, Debi might have decided to realize his share of the rent for himself. If Debi had merely gone to the house to collect the rent once a month, some sort of doubt might have arisen in his favour; but it appears from the evidence of the neighbours that he was seen going to and from the house fairly frequently. The excuse for his staying in the house from the 8th November onwards is anything but satisfactory.

According to his own story there were already three persons in the house to look after five persons who were ill. The story that he was asked to stay and help would have been an improbable one even if the inmates of the house were not involved in a criminal conspiracy. As matters stand, his story is incredible. There is no excuse whatever for Debi's failing to produce witnesses to prove that he had come from his house at Bally, on the other side of the river, only two days before the search of the house. The fact that he is a co-owner of the house is not sufficient to rebut the conclusions to be drawn against him from the circumstances of the case. On the contrary, the fact that he was a co-owner tells against him. He could not help being aware of the filthy use to which the rain pipe was put; and, had he been innocent, he would have strongly objected to such misuse of the premises. As part-owner of the house he would have sought an explanation of the extreme secrecy observed by the persons who were his tenants. He offers no explanation in regard to these matters; and his silence clearly indicates guilty knowledge. Having such knowledge it is incredible that he should have consented to stay in the house when asked to do so, unless he was himself a member of the conspiracy.

The appellants were all of them in possession of the explosive, and the unlicensed arms and were members of the conspiracy to possess them. They have been rightly convicted.

As regards the sentence: the commissioners have not stated why they classed Rajendra Lahiri with Hari Narayan and not with Birendra and the other three who were sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for five years. We have nothing before us to show who were the leaders of the conspiracy except the statements of the appellants themselves. Hari Narayan admits that he was the prime mover in the starting of the establishment at Dakshineswar; and he fully deserves the sentence passed upon him.

As regards Rajendra there is no evidence to prove that he was a leader; and we do not find anything on the record to justify his being punished more severely than Birendra, Dhrubesh or Nikhil. The only thing that suggests itself is that the commissioners have punished him more severely because he offered to take the fuse out of the bomb, but this in itself does not make his case more serious than that of Birendra and the others. His sentence is, therefore, reduced to that imposed upon those three persons, namely rigorous imprisonment for five years under S. 4 (b), Explosive Substances Act, and rigorous imprisonment for two years under S. 19 (f), Arms Act, the sentences to run concurrently. Considering the nature of the conspiracy, the sentence passed on the other appellants do not seem to be severe. The sentences passed in the present case on Dhrubesh and Rakhal shall run concurrently with the sentences passed on them in the Alipore Jail murder case. In other respects, except the above the appeals are dismissed.

Suhrawardy, J.—I fully agree with my learned brother in his decision on questions of law and in the observations on the evidence made by him in his lucid judgment. There is one matter on which I should like to lay some stress. When appearances are against the accused in a case, and the prosecution has established prima facie the existence of incriminating circumstances, it is the duty of the defence to rebut the presumption arising from them by some tangible evidence other than by mere criticism and suggestions or untested and uncorroborated statements from the dock. The idea that the defence is not bound to adduce any evidence is dangerous. In jury trials the last word may have some value, but in a trial before three experienced Judges the prosecution and the defence stand on the same footing. In this case there are matters that are within the special knowledge of the prisoners which, if they want the Court to accept, they must substantiate them by evidence. For instance, the prisoner alleged that some of them were students, gone to the house at Dakshineswar to prosecute their studies and that some others were either looking for work or making arrangements to start a business. These are matters which only the defence could prove and the absence of such proof lends strength to the case for the prosecution.

While I concur generally with my learned brother, I am unable to persuade myself that the evidence against the accused Debi Prosad Chatterjee is sufficient for conviction for possessing and conspiring to possess explosive articles which offences, my learned brother holds, have been proved against him. I am not sure that the facts proved against him are not at all consistent with his innocence though they also make it probable that he was one of the conspirators. To my mind, the most the evidence against him proves is that he was friendly with the inmates of the house and possibly was aware of their nefarious designs and practice. He may even have attempted to shield his friends from suspicion. But to convict him of possessing, manufacturing or conspiring to possess explosive articles within S. 5, Explosives Act, something more need be proved than his occasional visits to the house or his statement about the inmates of the house to Satis, P. W. 22, which is not true. There is another fact which apparently tells against him, but it is not enough to prove his possession of the articles, found in the house. It is proved that he made a certain statement to Mr Duckfield, Superintendent of Police, which he subsequently tore up. We do not know how far that statement incriminated him, and though it was of such a nature that it could not be legally proved, we cannot presume that it contained confession of the guilt of possessing the articles found. If such presumption can be made, it will frustrate the very object of the law which keeps out statements made to a police officer. Such a presumption may be more damaging than the statement itself. This incident, therefore, cannot be used as evidence against him.

The very fact of his occasionally visiting the house proves that he was not in possession of the things inside the house. It is probable that his statement that he was in the house for two days previous to the raid to help nursing the people who were admittedly very ill is true, for no article belonging to him was found in the house at the search. I am not convinced that temporary residence in a house containing explosive articles, even with the knowledge of their existence there, is possession, within the meaning of S. 5, Explosives Act. Conspiracy to possess, I take it, connotes some act of possession or attempted possession. On all these grounds I hold that the evidence for the prosecution falls short of bringing home to the accused Debi Prosad Chatterjee the charges under which he has been convicted, and in my opinion he should be given the benefit of doubt and acquitted. As my learned brother has taken a different view let the case of the accused Debi Prosad Chatterjee be placed before the Chief Justice for proper orders under S. 429, Criminal P. C. Let copies of our judgments be given to Babu Mrityunjoy Chatterjee, the vakil for the accused Debi Prosad Chatterjee.

Buckland, J.—The appellant Debi Prosad Chatterjee has been convicted by the commissioners appointed under sub-Ss. 1 and 2, S. 4, Bengal Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1925, of offences, under Ss. 120-B, I. P. C., 4 (b), Explosive Substances Act, and 19 (f), Indian Arms Act and sentenced to three years rigorous imprisonment under S. 4 (b), Explosive Substances Act, and to eighteen months' rigorous imprisonment under S. 19 (f), Indian Arms Act, the sentences to run concurrently. Nine persons in all of whom the present appellant was one were convicted. They all appealed. One of them was executed upon conviction in another case and the appeals of the others have been dismissed and the convictions and sentences have been affirmed except as regards Rajendra Nath Ishiri whose sentence has been reduced. But as regards Debi Prosad Chatterjee, owing to a difference of opinion between the learned Judges who heard the appeal the matter has been referred to me under S. 429, Criminal P. C. In these circumstances, it is unnecessary that I should state all the facts at length. They are to be found fully stated in the judgment of the commissioners and again in the judgment of my learned brother Mr. Justice Cammiade.

The question is whether the evidence supports the conviction of the particular appellant. The test is, I think, as the learned vakil who appears for him has put it, whether there is evidence upon the record of the commissioners upon which the conviction and the sentence can be supported. The point depends upon whether the evidence as to the appellant's association with the other persons convicted shows that he was at Dakshineswar at the times stated for a legitimate purpose or that he was there for the purposes which the prosecution alleges. There is evidence referring to instances more or less isolated when he was seen at Dakshineswar. But, without going into all the evidence in detail, there is in addition a considerable body of evidence of some five or six witnesses which, if believed, in my opinion, establishes the case for the prosecution. We first of all have the evidence of Nabin Kali Dobi who describes how the house was taken for these persons and how it was arranged by the present appellant. The matter is narrated at some length and Debi Prosad answered various questions by her as to whether the women-folk would come and so forth. The story is not, in my opinion, one which one would expect to hear, if it was a simple matter of Debi letting the house in which he had an interest to his friends for a legitimate purpose. The evidence is not very strong, but there is indication that in letting the house there was something that he wished to conceal. This is carried further by the evidence of Satish Chunder Chatterjee, a cousin of this appellant. To him the appellant made disingenuous statements, for, he said that he had got tenants for the house and that they were boys who messed together, that they were cousins and two of them had business and the others were students. He said that there were five—three brothers and two cousins—and they were acquaintances of his.

On that evidence, I should say, he was endeavouring to keep Satish Chunder Chatterjee in the dark and to make it appear that there was nothing which would give rise to any suspicion on the part of his relatives as to the persons to whom he was letting the house and at the same time endeavouring to conceal their identity; for his case is that he did not know all these persons and that they were not all his acquaintances before he let the house in August. Then, when we come to the time when the house was occupied by these persons, we find that there is evidence by the witness Norendra Nath Chatterjee who lived at Dakshineswar that he saw young men washing their faces in the tank and among them was the appellant whom he saw entering and leaving the house, but never going to the houses of the neighbours. Then we have the evidence of Sumira Mahato Koiri who says that he saw Debi Prosad taking his bath in the tank in front of the house which was afterwards searched. These facts show that Debi Prosad must have been on terms of some degree of intimacy with the occupants of the house; and the frequency with which he went there appears from the evidence of Suresh Chunder Chatterjee who said that he had seen Debi Prosad passing his house with other boys, that Debi Prosad had been seen there about two or three times a month and that the occupants of the house did not associate with the neighbours. If this evidence is believed, it is quite clear that the appellant was not frequenting the house at Dakshineswar for any of the purposes for which it is contended his object was in going there. It is suggested that he visited a sister living at Dakshineswar. There is no evidence that he went to her house and, even if he did so, it is quite consistent with the evidence to which I have referred.

A stronger argument has been based upon the fact that he was a co-sharer in the premises and went there to collect rent. But it is obvious that the evidence, if it is believed, proves that he went there in excess of what would be expected of a co-sharer landlord who simply went to collect rent. As regards the collection of rent, the evidence is that until the month of November various other parties who were interested—and not only the appellant—went to collect rent. The point, in my opinion, does not bear close investigation having regard to the rest of the evidence. It is further suggested that he simply went to see his former acquaintance; but there is also evidence showing that he was seen about with persons other than the one with whom, he says, he was formerly acquainted.

He endeavours to account for his presence on the day of the search—10th of November and two days earlier by stating that some of the inmates of the home were ill and he was asked to stay and help to watch them. That statement might possibly have been accepted had there been no such evidence against him; for, it appears that some of the inmates of the house were actually ill and it is conceivably possible that the appellant having gone there on the 8th November to collect rent was asked to stay and watch the sick and in his kindness of purpose did so. But it is difficult to believe that that wholly explains his staying there in the face of the other evidence as regards his association with these persons. If the evidence to which I have referred be believed, there can be no question as to the guilt of the appellant. In my judgment, no sufficient reasons have been advanced for showing that the view taken by the commissioners who tried the case was wrong or that I should take a different view of the evidence on appeal. In my judgment, the appeal must be dismissed and the conviction and sentence must be affirmed.

Appeal No. 225 of 1926, Decided on 5th July 1927, from the appellate order of the Sub-Judge, Dacca, D/- 15th March 1926.

Bengal Estates Partition Act (8 B. C. of 1876), S. 149—Estates Partition Act (5 B. C. of 1897), S. 119—The revenue officer who carries out the partition should not concern himself with the disputed question of title to the land under partition; only a civil Court has a right to decide that question.

The revenue officer who carries out the partition should not concern himself with or affect to decide disputed questions of title to the land under partition. Though S. 149 prohibits attempts that may be made by way of litigation to re-agitate such vexed questions as whether the partition as made or the proportionate revenue imposed upon any separate estate is fair or correct, it does not provide that a person who claims an interest in the land which is the subject of a partition should be deprived of the right to have the validity of his claim decided by a Court of law, although no doubt in certain circumstances the final decree in the title suit may be subject to the partition that was or will be made and must be framed in such manner as to give effect to the partition: 36 Cal. 726; 87 Cal. 662; 16 C. Page, J.—This appeal depends upon the true construction of S 149, Estates Partition Act (8 of 1876), now S 119 of Act 5, 1897. S 149 runs as follows :

No order of a revenue officer (d) made under Part IV, Part V, Part VI, Part VII, Part VIII, (except as provided in the next succeeding section) or Part IX shall be liable to be contested or set aside by a suit in any Court, or in any manner other than as is expressly provided in the Act.

The material facts for the purposes of this appeal are few and simple. An application for partition of a parent estate No. 397 in the Dacca Collectorate was preferred under the Act of 1876 by the registered proprietors. The partition was duly effected on 25th August 1912, and the appellants as recorded proprietors were put into possession of Sahams No. 15356 and No. 15340 which had been carved out of the parent estate, and had been allotted to them respectively. Many years after the partition proceedings had been completed the respondents filed the present suit No. 260 of 1924, in which they claimed a declaration that they were entitled to an 8 gandas share in kharija taluki right in Mauza Jhougara, part of the parent estate No. 397, and that after partition they were entitled in kharija taluki right to a 3-annas 15-gandas share in Saham No 15356 and to a 3-annas 17-gandas share in Saham No 15340. They also claimed a decree for possession of their said shares and incidental relief.

The trial Court dismissed the suit upon the ground that it was not maintainable under S. 149, Estates Partition Act, 1876. The lower appellate Court reversed the decree of the trial Court, holding that the suit was maintainable and remitted the case to the trial Court to be heard and determined on the merits. The question that falls for determination is whether or not in the suit as framed an order of a revenue officer within S 149 (d) is liable to be contested or set aside.

Now, the scheme of the Estates Partition Act, as I apprehend that enactment is to enable the co-sharers of an estate, each of whom jointly and severally are liable for the revenue to which it is assessed, to obtain a partition of the parent estate into two or more separate estates in such a form that on the one hand, the payment of the revenue secured upon the property should not be jeopardised, and, on the other hand, that the several co-sharers should be liable to pay only that portion of the revenue imposed upon the parent estate as had been charged upon the separate estates which respectively are allotted to them. But, as I read the Act, it was neither intended nor enacted that the revenue officer who carried out the partition, should concern himself with, or affect to decide disputed question of title to the land under partition. That is a function more fittingly performed by a Court of Law; the principal duty of the revenue officer in effecting the partition being to provide that the security for the payment of revenue should be safe-guarded. A perusal of the Act discloses that the revenue officer is to have regard to the claims of the recorded proprietors of the estate. It is only a recorded proprietor who is entitled to claim a partition under the Act, and it is the recorded proprietors whose names are to appear in "the paper of partition (S. 77)."

In my opinion the object of the Legislature in enacting S. 149 was to prohibit any attempt that otherwise might have been made by way of litigation to Appeals Nos. 275 to 280 of 1926, Decided on 24th May 1927.

(a) Landlord and Tenant—Relationship may be governed by status.

The relationship of landlord and tenant under Bengal Tenancy Act may be governed not only by contract but also by status.

(b) Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 158 (d)—Revenue officer is competent to ascertain the rate of rent and if there is none, to determine a fair and equitable rent.

* The revenue officer is, on a local enquiry, competent to ascertain the contract rent or rate of rent, but if he finds that there is none such, he is equally competent to determine a fair and equitable rent for each of the holdings; 3 C. W. N. 15, 6 C. W. N. 592 and 13 Cal. 182, (F. B.) Expl.

The determination of the rent under the section when it is fair and equitable rent for the holding must be such as is payable at the time of the application and on its basis only rent for future years may be realized and not for the years in arrears in the suit; while there is nothing to prevent the landlord from asking for a decree for back rents at such rate as the Court may find to be fair and equitable for the years in suit: 22 C. (d) Civil P. C., O. 41, R. 23—Court need not remand a case if the only object is to have enquiry under Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 158.

There is no point in sending the case down to the trial Court if the only object of adopting that course is to have an enquiry under S. 158, Bengal Tenancy Act by a revenue officer. The result of such enquiry may be taken into consideration by the appellate Court itself and then the appeal may be finally disposed of. [P 44 C 2]

Nabadvip Chandra Saha—for Appellants

Gunada Charan Sen, Santosh Kumar Bose, and Sisir Kumar Banerjee for Haridas Majumdar—for Respondents.

Mukerji, J.—The two main contentions of the appellants in these appeals being, first that the remand is bad, and second that S. 158, Bengal Tenancy Act, has been misappreciated by the Court below, it is necessary to examine the precise character of the suits which have given rise to the appeals and the nature of the reliefs asked for therein.

re-agitate such vexed questions as whether the partition as made, or the proportionate revenue imposed upon any separate estate, was correct or fair; see in this connexion Ananda Kishore v. Daiji Thakurani (1), Janaki Nath v. Kali Narain (2); Lakhi Chowdhuri v. Akloo Jha (3), Anil Kumar Biswas v. Rash Mohan Saha (4). Having regard to the elaborate machinery that had been set up for carrying out the partition it is, I think, clear that the Legislature intended that such matters should not be re-opened except as provided in the Act. But, in my opinion, the Legislature by enacting S. 149 did not intend or provide that a person who claimed an interest in the land which was the subject of a partition should be deprived by a Court of Law; although no doubt, in certain circumstances the final decree in the title suit would be subject to the partition that was or would be made, and must be framed in such manner as to give effect to the partition.

See for example Ss. 24 to 28 (to which S. 149 is not applicable), Ss. 116 and 150. In the present suit the respondents do not seek either to contest or disturb the partition as made, nor do they question in any way the quota of the revenue payable by any of the separate estates into which the parent estate has been divided. Indeed, if the respondents succeed in establishing their claim to a share in the sahams, the result will be that the ultimate liability of the recorded proprietors to pay revenue will pro tanto be diminished, while the payment of revenue will be further secured by reason of the added liability of the respondents to pay the revenue due.

For these reasons, in my opinion, the claim in the present suit is not barred by S. 149 of the Act of 1876 and the appeal must be dismissed with costs; the hearing fee being two gold mohurs.

(4) A. I. R. 1924 Cal. 245.

These six appeals arise out of as many suits for recovery of arrears of rent. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants paid rent at a certain rate for the holdings, and that in the record of rights no rent was entered, but it was only stated the holdings were liable to assessment of rent. The plaintiffs prayed ; (1) for rent at the said rates, and (2) that if the defendants denied those rates and the plaintiffs failed to prove them, they might be given decrees for fair and equitable rents, and they said that the rents they claimed represented such fair and equitable rents for the holding and that those rents should accordingly be settled as such. The defence, which is material at this stage, was that the rents of the holdings were really much less and were what were stated on their behalf.

There was a further prayer by the plaintiffs for enhancement under S. 30, Cl. (b), Bengal Tenancy Act, but this prayer was eventually withdrawn. There was a defence on the ground of remission on account of 'haja' but it was left open with the consent of both the parties as it was not pressed so far as these suits were concerned. During the pendency of the suits on the 4th July 1925, the plaintiff filed a petition for a local enquiry under S. 158, Bengal Tenancy Act. The Munsif rejected the petition holding that there was an existing rate of rent, which was the rate alleged on behalf of the defendants and when the existing rate could be determined an enquiry under that section for the determination of fair and equitable rent was not permissible. Being of that opinion he decreed the suit for the rents admitted by the defendants.

The Subordinate Judge on appeal by the plaintiffs has passed a judgment the terms of which are somewhat difficult of comprehension, and there has accordingly been a good deal of controversy at the Bar as to what he has exactly found. He has in the result, set aside the decrees of the trial Court and remanded the suits to that Court with directions to grant the plaintiffs' petition under S. 158, Bengal Tenancy Act. The defendants are the appellants to this Court from this order.

In our opinion, the two findings which the Subordinate Judge has recorded and which cannot be now challenged are : first that the plaintiffs could not prove a fixed jama as there was no such fixed jama, and second that the defendants could not prove fixed jama as there were none.

These two findings have been repeated in another part of the judgment in these words :

Regard being had to the evidence discussed above as adduced by the plaintiffs and the defendants, I find no hesitation to say that there were no fixed jama in existence.

Then he proceeded to observe thus :

It must be held that there was no subsisting contract and there must be an enquiry for ascertainment of fair and equitable rent.

In that view the learned Judge remanded the suits as indicated above.

The appellants' first ground, in our opinion, ought to succeed. There is no point in sending the cases down to the trial Court if the only object of adopting that course is to have an enquiry under S. 158, Bengal Tenancy Act, by a revenue officer. The result of such enquiry may be taken into consideration by the appellate Court itself and then the appeal may be finally disposed of. The last-mentioned course will have, if nothing else, this advantage that it will do away with the necessity of at least one appeal.

The next contention of the appellant is that S. 158 has no application as "the rent payable" within the meaning of Cl. (d) of the section is only the existing rent and not the fair and equitable rent. In support of this view reliance is placed upon the marginal note to the section which speaks of "application to determine incidents of tenancy" and certain decisions of this Court to which we shall presently refer. It is also contended that the plaintiff, having failed to prove the rate at which he claimed, is not entitled to decrees for fair and equitable rents even if they may be determined under S. 158.

In one of the earliest decisions of this Court, Nityanund Ghose v. Kishen Kishore (1), which was a suit instituted under S. 5, Act '10 of 1859 for the purpose of settling what the defendant's rents should be at the purgannah rate and to obtain from him a kabuliyat at those rates, this Court pointed out that where A avowedly holds and cultivates B's land, he is by the universal custom of this country B's tenant (even without express permission to cultivate on B's part, or express condition to pay rent on A's part and while so holding and cultivating, is bound to pay B a fair rent and to give him a kabuliyat. The learned Judges pointed out the distinction between the

(1) [1864] W. R. 1864 Act. 22. Ruling 82.

English law and the law of this country in this respect. Suits for pottahs and kabuliyats under the provisions of Act 10 of 1859 were somewhat rare and S. 158 was introduced to provide for a means of obtaining an authoritative statement of the essential incidents of a tenancy. Where there is an arrangement as to the rent that arrangement is the incident as to rental as contemplated by Cl. (d) of the section. Where there is the relationship of landlord and tenant without an arrangement as to the payment of rent properly so called the law recognizes an implied promise on the part of the tenant to pay a rent that is fair and equitable and that fair and equitable rent is the rent that is payable within the meaning of that clause. This is the view that was taken of the clause in the case of Barhamdutt Misser v. Krishna Sahay (2) where it was said that the relationship of landlord and tenant under the Bengal Tenancy Act may be governed not only by contract but also by status and that Cl. (d), S. 158, admits of the determination of fair and equitable rent when the fair and equitable rent is the rent that is payable by the tenant at the time of the application. This also is the view of the Patna High Court as expressed in the case of Ramgobind Singh v. Shashi Sekhar Prasad Singh (3). In some of the reported cases it has been said somewhat loosely, as I presume to think though with the utmost respect for the learned Judges who decided them, that "the rent payable" within the meaning of the clause is the "existing rent" in the sense of the rent that was being paid or had previously been paid, but when the decisions of these cases are examined in the light of the facts of the cases themselves it is doubtful whether any such proposition was ever meant to be laid down. Of these cases the more worthy of notice are the cases of Purna Rai v. Bunshidhur Singh (4), Sri Narain Thakur v. Luchmeshwar Singh (5) and Debendro Kumar Bundopadhyaya v. Bhupendro Narain Dutt (6). In the first of these cases there are some observations which support the appellants' contention but the show facts that the revenue officer there was given certain direction which went beyond what the revenue officer has to do under the section and also that the enquiry that was held by him was outside the range of the enquiry that was necessary for assessing fair and equitable rent for the tenants' holding. In the second case in a proceeding under S. 158 the Court proceeded to assess additional rent for excess lands found to be in the occupation of a tenant and it was held that it had no jurisdiction to do as its function was limited to record the existing rent payable at the time of the application and did not extend to assess additional rent for excess area. The last case mentioned above is more important as being a Full Bench decision of the Court. In that case it was observed that the object of this section is to enable the Court to ascertain what are the incidents of the existing arrangements between a landlord and the tenant, and not to enable the Court in effect to make a new contract for parties between whom no contract was in existence at any time before the date of the application

The facts of that case in connexion with which these observations were made were that under colour of an application under S. 158 asking for the determination of the incidents of a tenancy a lease was sought to be set aside under which the tenant came into possession. In our opinion the appellant's contention is not well-founded. The revenue officer will, on the local enquiry he will hold, be competent to ascertain the contract rate or rate of rent; if he finds that there is none such, he will be equally competent to determine a fair and equitable rent for each of the holdings. In the latter case the fair and equitable rent is the rent payable in respect of the holding on the basis of the implied promise which the status will give rise to.

Here a further question arises, as it seems to be the view of the learned Subordinate Judge that if the revenue officer finds fair and equitable rents the plaintiff will be entitled to decrees on the basis thereof. This follows from his omission to give any further directions on the point and is likely to mislead any Court that may have occasion to deal with the suits hereafter. The question, therefore requires consideration.

As has been pointed out by Richardson, J., in his well-considered judgment in the case of Dhananjoy Manjhi v. Unendranath Deb (7) a suit to assess rent is consistent with and arises out of the general law and the land revenue system of the country, and is irrespective of anything in the Bengal Tenancy Act. The learned Judge in that judgment referred to certain cases in which a claim for assessment of rent and for recovery of such rent for a certain period has been either expressly held as maintainable or has passed unquestioned. On the other hand in Partab Mohon v. Wazir-un-Nisa (8), the learned Judges of the Patna High Court, following an earlier decision of the same Court laid down that in a suit for assessment of a fair and equitable rent it is understood that rent had not been settled or paid hitherto and the Court is asked to determine the rent to be paid in future and, therefore, the plaintiff is not entitled to claim rent in arrears at the rate to be assessed as fair and equitable in the suit. The two views are not necessarily conflicting. The determination of the rent payable under Cl (d), S 158, when it is the fair and equitable rent for the holding must be such as is payable at the time of the application and on its basis only rent for future years may be realized and not for the year in arrears in the suit; while there is nothing to prevent the landlord from asking for a decree for the back rents at such rate as the Court may find to be fair and equitable for the years in suit. If the revenue officer is able to determine the contract rents the plaintiff will undoubtedly be entitled to decrees on the footing thereof. If he finds only fair and equitable rents those can only be such rents as are payable at the time of the application. In the latter case the plaintiffs having failed to prove the contract rents as alleged by them, and there being nothing to show what the fair and equitable rents for the period in suit was the plaintiffs' claim will be allowed only to the extent it is admitted by the defendants, and they will be entitled to a declaration as to the fair and equitable rents that are found for the holdings.

With these directions we allow the appeal and set aside the order of the learned Subordinate Judge and send the cases back to his Court so that the Court may now direct an enquiry under Cl 2 of S. 158, Bengal Tenancy Act, and on receipt of the report of the revenue officer as regards the result of that enquiry proceed Jatindara Mohan Chowdhury for Jitendra Nath Sen Gupta—for Opposite Party.

Judgment.—This is an application under S. 25, Provincial Small Causes Courts Act, to revise a decree passed by the learned Munsif of the Small Cause Court at Munshigunge. The suit was brought to recover money lent upon interest which was repayable on demand. The money was lent on the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th and 6th May 1923. On the 14th June 1926 the plaintiff filed the present suit. Prima facie his cause of action is time-barred. The learned Munsif, however, held that the claim was not time-barred, and decreed the suit in part.

Two points are taken by the learned vakil for the opposite party. The first is that the period between the 2nd May 1926 and 6th June 1926 should be deducted from the period of limitation upon the ground that during that period the petitioner was prosecuting in good faith a suit to recover the subject-matter of the present suit in the Union Court in Bihar which Court from defect of jurisdiction or through causes of a like nature was unable to entertain it. It was the common case of the petitioner and the opposite party that in law and in fact the Union Court of Bihar had jurisdiction to entertain the suit. But the learned vakil for the opposite party contended, having regard to orders passed by the Union Court, that the opposite party should be given the benefit of S. 14, Limitation Act, upon the ground that his failure to prosecute the suit in the Small Cause Court was due not to lack of diligence on his part but to the act of the Union Court. When the suit came on for the hearing before Union Court that Court passed the following order :

It being desirable that there should be a proper trial conducted by persons versed in law of the question regarding the document filed by the plaintiffs and regarding the question of the rate of interest, this Court orders that the suit be conducted in the proper Court.

I am unable to accede to this contention. The opposite party was guilty of considerable and unreasonable delay in taking steps to recover the debt due to him. He waited until the 2nd May 1926 (within two or three days of the expiration of the three years' period of limitation) before he filed his suit in the Union Court. If he had filed his suit with due diligence in the Union Court there would be ample time after the Union Court had considered the matter for him to have presented his suit in the Court of Small Causes, within time. Further, I am not prepared to hold, having regard to what fell from the Union Court on the 6th June that the Court intended thereby to decline to entertain the suit or to decide that it had no jurisdiction or that through want of jurisdiction or any other cause of a like nature it was unable to entertain the suit.

The second contention upon which the learned vakil for the opposite party sought to uphold the decision under review was that, assuming that he was entitled to the benefit of S. 14 for the period between the 2nd May and 6th June, he was also entitled upon the same ground to the benefit of S. 14 in respect of the period from the 6th June to 14th June because on the 6th June he had applied for a copy of the order of the Union Court that had been passed on that date, but the copy was not supplied to him until the 12th June, which was a Saturday, and he filed his suit in the Small Cause Court on the following Monday the 14th. In support of this contention he relied upon the case of Lakshiram Mandal v. Sonatan Basar(1) decided by Mookerje and Teunon, JJ. in which their Lordships gave a very wide and liberal interpretation to the provisions of S. 14.

It is unnecessary to express any opinion as to the correctness of that decision because, in my opinion, it was unnecessary for the opposite party to wait from the 6th to the 14th June before he filed his suit in the Small Cause Court. The suit could have been filed without a copy of the order of the Union Court, although no doubt it would have been right and proper to draw the attention of the Small Cause Court to what had taken place in the Union Court in due course. In my opinion, neither of the two grounds upon which the learned vakil on behalf of the opposite party has based his contention that the order under review should be supported is sound. The result is that the suit in the Small Cause Court was barred by limitation, and the decree passed by the Munsif on the 22nd December 1926 cannot stand. The decree is set aside, and the suit dismissed.

In the circumstances of this case I make no order as to costs in either Court. and I desire to express no opinion as to whether it is still open to the opposite party to prosecute the proceedings which he initiated on the 2nd May before the Union Court.

Syed Nasim Ali—for Appellants.

Manmatha Nath Roy and Urukramdas Chakravarty—for Respondents.

Cammiade, J.—This is an appeal by the defendants in a suit for recovery of possession of six bighas and 15 cottas of land comprised in a tenancy the exact nature of which has not been ascertained by either of the learned Courts below. The plaintiff sued on the allegation that this tenancy was an under-raiyati tenancy, and that the defendants were trespassers who had purchased the interests of the late tenants and had acquired no right by their purchase. The Court of first instance dismissed the suit but the Court of appeal below decreed it. The facts are as follows:

The tenancy had originally been held by one Asmatulla who had several sons and daughters. After Asmatulla's death the tenancy seems to have been held, according to the case of both parties, by two of Asmatulla's sons, Samiruddi and Robbani. The first defendant is another son of Asmatulla and the second defendant is a grandson by another son; and these two defendants purchased the tenancy from Samiruddi and Robbani by two decrees, one of the year 1310 and the other of the year 1312 B. S. The plaintiff had granted rent receipts to the defendants from so far back as 1312 showing them as marfatdars. The suit for ejectment was instituted in 1920 corresponding to 1327 B. S. so that the defendants had been paying rents to the plaintiff for 15 years at least before the institution of the suit. The learned Subordinate Judge in decreeing the suit held that, although the plaintiff had been receiving the rent from these defendants from so far back as the year 1312, because these defendants were members of the family of Asmatulla, the plaintiff was not aware till quite recently, that is to say, within 12 years from the date of the suit, that the defendants were claiming to hold the land by virtue of their own title. The Court of first instance found in so many words that the defendants had been in possession from the time of their purchase. Although that finding is not reproduced in express terms in the judgment of the appellate Court still the wording of that judgment shows that that finding was accepted and that the Subordinate Judge was of opinion that the mere fact of possession and assertion of title for a period of more than 12 years did not confer title on the defendants because the plaintiff was not aware of the assertion of such title.

This matter has been discussed in the case of Prohabati Dasi v. Taibaturinessa Chaudhurani (1) and in Panchkari Chattapadhya v. Maharaj Bahadur Singh (2). In both these cases it has been said that the knowledge or want of knowledge on the part of the landlord was perfectly immaterial in regard to the question of acquisition of a limited interest in property by adverse possession, and that a landlord as against whom a person has been asserting tenant-right cannot repudiate the other man's interest unless he can prove that he was fraudulently kept out of knowledge of the assertion of the title by the other man. It is only by invoking the aid of S. 18, Limitation Act, that the landlord can avoid the effect of possession and assertion of title by a third person claiming the interest of a tenant on the land. It is obvious that if a person occupies the land for a period of 12 years he may acquire, if he so chooses, an absolute interest in the land, and it is only because he chooses to assert only a limited interest that he acquires only such limited interest. Therefore, whether the landlord chooses to make himself acquainted with the facts that the man in possession asserts his own title to the land or not limitation will run against the landlord. In these circumstances the decision of the first Court must be upheld. The decision of the Subordinate Judge is reversed and that of the Munsif is restored with costs in all the Courts.

Appeal No 216 of 1925, Decided on 13th July 1927 from the appellate decree of the Second Sub-Judge, Chittagong, D/- 8th September 1924.

Civil P. C., S. 100—Mushaa.

The question as to whether a gift is bad as offending against the doctrine of mushaa is a mixed question of law and fact and it cannot for the first time be raised in second appeal: 35 Cal. 1 (P. C.), Rel. on. [P 49 C 2]

Narendra Kumar Das—for Appellants
Chandra Sekhar Sen — for Respondents.

Cuming, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit for a declaration of the plaintiff's raiyati title and for recovery of possession of the lands described in the schedules to the plaint. The case of the plaintiff was that the lands had been gifted to her by her mother Hadya Bibi by means of a hebanama. The case of the defendant was a denial of the plaintiff's title.

The first Court decreed the plaintiff's suit in a modified form. The plaintiff's title in kayami mukarrari right to plot (ka) measuring 12½ gundas and to the disputed land described in Sch. 2 was declared and she was to get ejmali possession of these lands with the defendants. Defendants 1 (ka), 1 (kha) and 1 (gha) appealed to the District Court and there was also an appeal by the plaintiff. The District Court ordered the decree of the first Court to be modified to this extent: that the decree should be for exclusive possession of the lands of Sch. 2 of the plaint; and in the other lands the decree made by the first Court to the extent of the plaintiff's share for ejmali possession with the defendants was to stand. Neither of the lower Courts determined the question of the plaintiff's share in 12½ gundas land in which she was to get ejmali possession with the other defendants. Defendants 1 (ka), 1 (kha), 1 (ga) and 1 (gha) have appealed to this Court.

The appellants have raised three points: first of all, that the gift of an undivided share is bad as it offends against the Mahomedan doctrine of mushaa; secondly, that it is neither alleged nor proved that the gift was accompanied by delivery of possession; and lastly, that the decree of the lower appellate Court is in vague terms and that the lower appellate Court should have determined the question of share.

With regard to the first point: the respondent contends that the question of mushaa is a mixed question of law and fact and it cannot be raised for the first time in second appeal. He draws our attention to the case of Ibrahim Goolam Ariff v. Saiboi (1), a decision of the Privy Council in which it has been pointed out that the doctrine of mushaa is entirely unadapted to a progressive state of society and that it should be confined within the strictest rules. The respondent, I think, is quite correct in her contention. The question as to whether the gift was bad as it offended against the doctrine of mushaa is a mixed question of law and fact. It is possible in certain circumstances, for instance where the gift is made to a co-heir, it does not offend against the doctrine of mushaa. That being so, it is not open to the appellants to raise what is clearly a mixed question of law and fact for the first time in second appeal.

The next point argued by the learned vakil for the appellants is that it is neither alleged nor proved that the gift was accompanied by delivery of possession. On this point there is a definite finding of the first Court that the necessary formalities had been complied with. That Court described those formalities as being a declaration of the gift by the donor and acceptance of the gift by the donee and delivery of such possession as the subject of gift is susceptible. This finding has not been set aside by the lower appellate Court. Both these points are, therefore, decided against the appellants.

There remains now the last remaining point: that the lower appellate Court should have determined the share of the plaintiff. The respondent is equally of opinion that the lower appellate Court should have determined the share of the plaintiff. The case will, therefore, be remanded to the lower appellate Court and the lower appellate Court will pass its decree after it has determined the share of the plaintiff in the 12½ gundas plot.

The plaintiff-respondent is entitled to her costs in this Court.

A. A. Avetoom—for Creditors in the 1st Insolvency.

B. K. Ghosh—for Creditors in the 2nd Insolvency.

Judgment.—On the 4th February 1915, John Marchmont Gregory was adjudicated insolvent, on his own petition. No assets were recovered by the Official Assignee in that insolvency, and on the 3rd August 1920 the insolvent obtained an unconditional discharge.

On the 18th February 1925 John Marchmont Gregory on his own petition was again adjudicated insolvent, and his property thereupon became vested in the Official Assignee for distribution among his creditors under Ss. 17 and 52, Presidency Towns Insolvency Act (Act 3 of 1909).

On the 13th July 1926, as a result of the transaction into which the insolvent had entered after he had obtained his discharge from the first insolvency, and before the second adjudication, a sum of Rs. 97,670-12-0 was acquired by the insolvent, and passed into the hands of the Official Assignee as assets distributable in the second insolvency. Meanwhile, on the 30th April 1925 the order of discharge of the 3rd August 1920 was rescinded, on the ground that when applying for discharge the insolvent had misled the Court as to the state of his affairs. Accordingly, it was ordered that the adjudication of the 4th February 1915 should be revived. On the 10th February 1927 pursuant to S. 91, Insolvency Act, an order was made that the proceedings in the two insolvencies should be consolidated. All the above orders were passed by the Registrar in Insolvency.

The question that arises on this petition is whether the creditors in the first insolvency are entitled to participate in the said sum of Rs. 97,670-12-0 and any other assets distributable in the second insolvency. The creditors in the second insolvency contend (1), that the order of the 30th April 1925 rescinding the order of discharge was ultra vires the Registrar in Insolvency, and is null and void; (2) that in any event, having regard to the order of discharge, the rights of the creditors in the first insolvency ought to be postponed to those of the creditors in the second insolvency.

In support of the first contention learned counsel for the petitioner urged that, inasmuch as the application for an order rescinding the order of discharge was a substantive and opposed application, the Registrar in Insolvency had no jurisdiction in the matter. Now, the Registrar in Insolvency has no jurisdiction to entertain an opposed application for the discharge of an insolvent, and it was argued with plausibility that the Registrar in Insolvency ought not to be entitled to hear an opposed application for the rescission of an order of discharge, because the application, if granted, might react upon the rights of persons who in good faith had transacted business with the insolvent after the order of discharge and prior to its rescission in a manner gravely prejudicial to their interests. There is much force in this contention: but I am concerned to ascertain, not whether the Registrar in Insolvency ought to have jurisdiction, but whether he has it, and under the law as it obtains at present I am of opinion that the Registrar in Insolvency was entitled to make the order of the 30th April 1925.

The order of discharge of the 3rd August 1920 was passed by the Registrar in Insolvency upon the unopposed application of the insolvent. That order the Registrar had jurisdiction to make under S. 6 (2), Insolvency Act, and the direction of Jenkins, C. J., dated 23th May 1915.

It appears to me that under S. 8 (1), Insolvency Act, the Registrar in Insolvency had jurisdiction to pass the order of the 30th April 1925 rescinding the order of discharge that he himself had made, whether the application for rescission was opposed or unopposed: see Ex parte Summers (1). Further, under S. 6 (2) (c), Insolvency Act, and General R. 5, Calcutta Insolvency Rules of 1910, in my opinion, the Registrar in Insolvency had jurisdiction also to hear the application for rescission of the order of discharge as being an application "that may be heard and determined in chambers."

No appeal has been preferred against the order of the 30th April 1925, and upon both these grounds I am of opinion that the order of the 30th April 1925 rescinding the order of discharge of the 3rd August 1920 is a valid and effective order.

In these circumstances, as I apprehend the matter, the respective rights of the creditors in the two insolvencies would be the same whether or not the order consolidating the insolvencies had been made. It appears to me that, subject to any bona fide and valid disposition of the property of the insolvent that had been effected between the date of his discharge and its rescission, the said sum of Rs 97,670-12-0 and any other assets recovered by the Official Assignee in the second insolvency would become assets distributable in the second insolvency, and that the Official Assignee as the representative of the creditors in the first insolvency is entitled to prove in the second insolvency, and to receive dividends pari passu with the creditors in the second insolvency.

A solution of the problem in this sense, I think, is in consonance with the ratio underlying the provisions of S. 39 (1), English Bankruptcy Act, 1915, and the decision of the Court of appeal in Ex parte Pitt (2). I can understand that the creditors in the second insolvency may feel aggrieved that the creditors in the first insolvency should receive a share of the assets recovered in the second insolvency as a result of a transaction into which the insolvent entered when he was sui juris and discharged from liability under the first insolvency; but the hardship is more apparent than real, for if persons choose to have business relations with a debtor who has obtained his discharge, but who in certain events may again revert to a state of insolvency, such persons take the risks that are incidental to all transactions with persons under actual or potential disability (such as a minor or a woman possessing a Hindu widow's estate), and have only themselves to blame if they have miscalculated the chances of the transaction to which they have chosen to become parties.

An order will be passed giving effect to the view that I have expressed. The costs of both sets of creditors as of a hearing will be paid out of the assets available for distribution in the second insolvency.

Order accordingly.

Appeal No. 286 of 1924, Decided on 9th February 1927, from the original decree of the Sub-Judge, Khulna, D/-27th September 1924

(a) Bengal Patni Regulation (8 of 1819), S. 11 (3)—Occupancy raiyats cannot be ejected.

Clause 3, S. 11, only provides certain restrictions on the right of an auction purchaser to eject certain persons, which right has been given by the previous clauses of that section. If the right of the person in occupation does not come within the first or the second clause of that section, and if the occupier of the land is protected from ejectment by some other law, there is no reason to suppose that S. 11 of the Regulation gives authority to the auction-purchaser to eject that occupier of the land by virtue of his purchase: 3 C. W. N. 13, Doubted.

The proviso in the third clause does not mean that persons in occupation not coming within the definition of khudkasht raiyats, are liable to be ejected, even if they have acquired occupancy rights under the tenancy law.

[P 54 C 1]

(b) Landlord and Tenant—Khudkasht means resident hereditary cultivator—Land and waste and infested with wild animals—Tenants living in adjacent villages are khudkasht

A khudkasht raiyat is a resident, hereditary cultivator in contradistinction to Paikast raiyat, that is a migratory tenant. Where the tenants were resident within the patni mahal, but outside the jungle tract, which did not form part of any village, and where no man could live, and the land was at that time infested with tigers and other wild animals, it would not be reasonable to say that these tenants were not khudkasht tenants although they were residents of contiguous villages within the patni, especially when they belong to a class whose only mode of life is by cultivation: 20 W. B. B. Ghose, J.—This appeal arises out of an action in ejectment, and is on behalf of some of the defendants in suit No. 55 tried by the Subordinate Judge of Khulna. The facts are these: There is a Sayedpur Trust Estate, which has got the zemindari interest. A patni was created consisting of certain mouzahs within that estate in 1821 in favour of two persons named Gopi Roy and Kali Roy. Within the patni there was a large tract of jungle and apparently it was not included within any of the mouzahs. In 1843 some of the persons, who held the property in darpatni interest executed a lease of about 600 bighas of jungle land under certain terms in favour of two persons, named Ramjiban Jotedar and Ram Sundar Mandal. Sometime after that the patni interest appears to have come into the possession of certain Boses. On the 9th October 1879 these Boses granted a lease of 600 bighas of patni and jungle lands excluding 400 bighas of dhap lands in favour of four persons, who may be called Jotedars and Mandals. There was also a stipulation that the 400 bighas excluded, which was described as dhap lands, might be taken possession of by the lessees after reclaiming those lands at a certain rate of rent. The provision with regard to rent was in the usual manner of progressive rent from time to time, and stipulating that the rent would be at a certain rate from the year 1304, that is 1897. This patni was put up to sale under Regulation 8 of 1819 on the 15th May 1914, and was purchased by the plaintiffs. After their purchase they served notice on all persons, who were the descendants of the original lessees under the lease of 1879, and all those who had derived title under these lessees or their representatives. A large number of persons was impleaded as defendants.

Most of them came to an agreement with the plaintiffs and compromised the suit. The appellants before us fought out the suit in the Court below, and a decree for ejectment has been made as against them.

The case of the plaintiffs was that under the provisions of S. 11, Regulation 8 of 1819, they were entitled to eject the defendants and to recover khas possession of the lands in question. Various pleas were taken in defence but the main defence was that the lessees under the lease of 1879 were khudkhasht raiyats and therefore protected under the third clause of S. 11 of the regulation. Secondly, even if it be considered that they were not khudkhasht raiyats, they acquired right of occupancy as raiyats by holding the lands for more than 12 years and consequently they are protected from ejection under the provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Act, notwithstanding the provisions of S. 11, Regulation 8 of 1819. Another plea was sought to be raised that the plaintiff had acquired no right by virtue of the regulation sale, as certain steps were not taken under the regulation.

Besides those pleas, other pleas were taken and a large number of issues was raised in the Court below. It is unnecessary to mention these as they are absolutely immaterial for the purposes of the appeal. The Subordinate Judge held that the defendants were not khudkhast raiyats. Secondly, he held that not being khudkhast raiyats, they are liable to ejection, as Cl. 3, S. 11 of the regulation does not protect them. He further held that the defendants were tenure-holders, and their interest was an incumbrance coming under Cl. 1, S. 11 of the regulation, and therefore they have no right to remain on the land after the patni sale. He also held that the defendants could not challenge the validity of the patni sale collaterally by way of defence in the present suit. On these findings he made his decree in ejection. Twelve of the defendants have appealed to this Court. One of them, defendant 18, is one of the representatives of the original lessees under the lease of 1879. Others claimed under various sub-leases from the lessees or from the sub-lessees under those lessees. It is unnecessary for our purpose to state the origin of the title of those subordinate holders.

Three main questions have been argued on behalf of the appellants before us. It is stated firstly, that the predecessors of defendant 18 were khudkhast raiyats and the lease being a bona fide lease in their favour the plaintiffs are not entitled to eject him, and consequently the plaintiffs are not entitled to eject the tenants holding under rights subordinate to the lessees under the lease of 1879. The second point was that the defendants have, by their cultivation of the lands, themselves acquired occupancy rights under Act 10 of 1859 as well as under the Bengal Tenancy Act, and are, therefore, not liable to be ejected. The third point taken was that the Collector had no jurisdiction to sell the putni under Regulation 8 of 1819 on account of certain circumstances, one of which was that he was the manager of the Sayedpur Trust Estate.

The third point may be taken up first and disposed of, on the ground that this plea was not taken in the lower Court, nor does it appear in the issues raised in that Court. The question not having been discussed in the lower Court, we are not inclined to allow that question to be raised for the first time in this Court. The other facts upon which they rely as to the invalidity of the sale are not such as would make the sale void, and therefore, in my judgment there is no substance in that point raised.

As regards the second point, the Subordinate Judge seems to have been of opinion that even if the defendants had acquired the right of occupancy under the Bengal Tenancy Act they were liable to be ejected under the provisions of S. 11, Regulation 8 of 1819. His view apparently was that under the third clause of that section, only khudkhast raiyats or resident and hereditary cultivators are protected, and whoever does not come within the description of that class of raiyats, is liable to be ejected at the instance of a purchaser at a patni sale. He apparently relies in support of that contention on the case of Jogeshwar Mazumdar v. Abed Mahomed Sirkar (1). In my judgment that view of the Subordinate Judge is erroneous. Apart from authority, if Cl. 3, S. 11 is examined, it will be apparent that it only provides certain restrictions on the right of an auction purchaser to eject certain persons, which right has been given by the previous clauses of that section. Under the first clause certain incumbrances, which had accrued upon the taluk, were liable to be cancelled. The second clause deals with leases creative of a middle interest between the resident-cultivator and the late proprietor, and the third clause mentions an exception to the right of the purchaser. If the right of the person in occupation does not come within the first or the second clause of that section, and if the occupier of the land is protected from ejection by some other law, there is no reason to suppose that S. 11 of the regulation gives authority to the auction-purchaser to eject that occupier of the land by virtue of his purchase. The case of Jogeshwar Mazumdar (1) can only be reasonably construed as an authority for the proposition that a lease is an incumbrance. If it be construed as an authority for laying down the proposition that even an occupancy raiyat is liable to be ejected by an auction-purchaser because he does not come within Cl. 3, S. 11 of the regulation, with all respect I must say that I am unable to accept that proposition. That case has been interpreted and doubted in various other cases. See Sradyote Kumar Tagore v. Gopi Krishna Mandal (2), Tamizuddin Khan v. Khoda Nawaz Khan (3), and also the case of Bama Charan v. Ramkanai (4). In the last case, the learned Judges observed that the case of Jageshwur Mazumdar (1) did not lay down that an occupancy right is an incumbrance, and as a matter of fact it could not have been so laid down as an incumbrance, as contemplated in Cl. 1, S. 11 of the regulation. There is ample authority for the proposition that the proviso in the third clause does not mean that persons in occupation not coming within the definition of khudkhasht raiyats, are liable to be ejected, even if they have acquired occupancy rights under the tenancy law. I have not been able to find any authority with regard to patni sules, but the cases with reference to S 16, Act 8, 1865, where the proviso is in the same terms as the proviso in the third clause of S. 11, Regulation 8 of 1819, support the proposition. Those cases are Pureeag Singh v. Purtab Narain Singh (5); Nil Madhub Karmokar v. Shiloo Paul (6); Emam Ali Mistry v. Ator Ali Khan (7); Bama Charan Gorai v. Ram Kanai Dubey (4).

The second proposition, therefore, on behalf of the appellants ought to be accepted. But the question is whether the defendants had acquired a right of occupancy by remaining in possession of the disputed land for the requisite period under the Bengal Tenancy Act. It is not necessary for me to examine the evidence or the terms of the lease in detail having regard to the view I have taken with regard to the first question. The learned advocate for the respondents has argued with considerable stress, that the lease of 1879 was the grant of a tenure and if the lessees were tenure-holders they could not under the provisions of the law, acquire a right of occupancy as raiyats with regard to lands which they had themselves cultivated within their own tenure. That proposition seems to me to be unassailable. It is unnecessary for me to discuss the question whether the lease should be construed as the grant of a tenure or whether it should be considered as a mere raiyati lease, as is contended for equally strenuously on behalf of the appellants by their learned advocate. It is sufficient for my purpose to state that these lessees were illiterate people and actual cultivators themselves. They belong to the caste of Pote, one of that class of people who are considered to be untouchables. It can hardly be supposed that they were to act the part of landlords or tenure holders. The only point that can be urged against their being raiyats is that the area of the demised premises exceeds by far 100 bighas of land.

I next come to the first point urged, and it is this, that the defendants are khudkhasht raiyats. The Subordinate Judge has found that the appellants have no dwelling house within the village in which the lands in question are situate. His finding is that some of them have got mere chalas where they stayed during the time of cultivation. He further relies upon the vakalatnamas filed by some of these defendants in which their residences have been described as in another village. He, therefore, does not believe the evidence given by the defendants' witnesses, that they are resident hereditary cultivators. I may mention that the descriptions in the vakalatnamas do not amount to anything. These people are illiterate. Their vakalatnamas must have been written by the clerks of their pleaders, and the clerks of their pleaders must have written their residence from the copy of the summons that was served upon the defendants, and their residence in the copy of the summons must have been taken from the plaint in which the plaintiff chose to describe the defendants as being residents of a different village.

That being so, the only evidence that remains is the evidence of those defendants as to their place of residence. But that also is not decisive of the question, because at the time when the lease was granted it was not known within which village the jungle land was situate. In the description of the property in the lease of 1879, it was described as in Mouzah Sahapur Bil, where the details of the kistibundi as regards the payment of rent was given. In the schedule of boundaries it is described as in the Bil, south-west of Ramkrishnapur Ghona, within Taraf Sahapur. In para. 4 of the plaint the plaintiffs described it as situated on the south of the thak map that was prepared with respect to Ramkrishnapur and Ghona mouzahs jointly. From this it appears that the property was not actually situated within the village of Ramkrishnapur or Ghona. The lessees in 1879 were all residents of Ruprampur and Madhavkati, which villages, it appears, are within the patni mahal which has been purchased by the plaintiffs at the auction sale. What is the meaning of khudkhast raiyat? It is resident, hereditary cultivator in contradistinction to palkast raiyat, that is a migratory tenant. If the tenants were resident within the patni mahal but outside the jungle tract, which did not form part of any village, and where no man could live—and it is in evidence that the land in question was at that time infested with tigers and other wild animals would it be reasonable to say that these tenants were not khudkhast tenants although they were residents of contiguous villages within the patni? I think not. There is ample evidence on the record to show that these jotedars and mandals were raiyats of the villages in which they lived, and as I have already stated, they belong to a class whose only mode of life is by cultivation. That these men may be considered to be khudkhast raiyats is supported by the observations of Mr. Justice Markby in the case of Nubokishore Biswas v. Judub Chunder Sircar (8)

I may state in passing that the Subordinate Judge is clearly wrong in observing that that case was not followed in the later cases mentioned by him. Now, if the tenants to whom the lease was given in 1879 were khudkhast raiyats, then their case falls within Cl. 3, S. 11 of the patni regulation; and that clause lays down that the purchaser is not entitled to eject the khudkhast raiyats, nor to cancel bona fide engagements made with such tenants by the late incumbent, except it be proved in a regular suit to be brought by such purchaser for the adjustment of his rent, that a higher rate would have been demandable at the time such engagements were contracted by his predecessor.

Now the only ground on which the plaintiffs might bring this action, as it seems to me, is that this was not a bona fide engagement. That has not been stated in the plaint, and having regard to the nature of the land, which was absolutely jungle, and the purpose for which the lease was granted, that is, for the purpose of reclaiming by these people, who were residents of villages close by, it can hardly be said that it was not a bona fide lease given to the lessees by the then patnidars. No attempt has been made to show that the rent then fixed was not the proper rent demandable. The representatives of the lessees under the lease of 1879 cannot therefore be ejected by the plaintiffs, and consequently the persons claiming under them or their representatives are also not liable to be ejected.

In this view as I have already stated, it is unnecessary for me to determine whether the lease created a tenure or a raiyati interest. Whether it is an incumbance falling within Cl. 1 of the section or not, need not also be determined having regard to my finding that the lessees were khudkhast raiyats and the lease was a bona fide lease for the purpose of reclaiming jungle lands. The result, therefore, is that this appeal must be allowed, and the suit for ejectment against these defendants-appellants must be dismissed with costs. The costs in this Court will be given to the appellants other than appellants 8, 9 and 12. The applications are not pressed and are dismissed without costs.

Civil Rule No. 671 of 1927, Decided on 2nd August 1927, from an order of the 1st Sub-Judge, Pabna, D/- 20th May 1927, in Declaratory Suit No. 109 of 1927.

(a) Court-fees Act, S. 7, Cl. 4 (c) and (d)—Suit for declaration and injunction—The value of injunction for purposes of Court-fees is really the value at which the injury to the plaintiffs should be assessed.

According to S. 7, Cl. 4, (c) and (d), the amount of the fee is to be computed according to the amount at which the relief sought is valued in the plaint, provided valuation is not arbitrary—not under-valued to evade payment of proper Court-fees—and it is for that purpose necessary to look to the substance of the allegations made and of the reliefs sought for. The value of the relief is its value to the plaintiff and not the value of the property involved and, therefore, the value of the injunction to the plaintiffs is really the value at which the injury to the plaintiffs should be assessed. [P 56 C 1, 2]

(b) Court-fees—Admission as to computation is not binding,

An admission by the plaintiff in respect of computation of Court-fees is not binding on him, the question being one of law and not of fact. [P 56, C 2]

Judgment.—The only question in this rule is whether the Court-fees paid on the plaint are adequate.

The plaint, in substance, challenges the validity of the imposition which purports to have been made under Ss. 15 and 15-A, General Police Act (5 of 1861) and the mode in which the amounts are about to be realized, namely in accordance with Ss. 386 and 387, Criminal P C, which is one of the modes provided for in S. 16 of the said Act. The prayers are for certain declaration and a permanent injunction restraining the realization of the amounts by the said method.

The Subordinate Judge is of opinion that Rs. 1,682 and Rs. 18,301 are the amounts of tax and compensation that remain unrealized, and the suit, therefore, relates to the plaintiffs' liabilities which should be assessed at the sum total of these two amounts. He thinks that the reliefs sought for in the plaint involve declaration in respect of liabilities and an injunction restraining the realization of the said amount and that, therefore, the Court-fees should be paid ad valorem on the aggregate of the aforesaid two amounts.

The reliefs sought for in the plaint come within S. 7, Cl. 4 (c) and (d) of the Court-fees Act. Prima facie, in accordance with the terms of that section, the amount of fee is to be computed according to the amount at which the relief sought is valued in the plaint. Of course the valuation should not be arbitrary and any device to evade the payment of proper Court-fees by casting the prayers in a way so as to admit of lesser Court-fees being paid should be guarded against and for that purpose it is necessary to look to the substance of the allegations made and of the reliefs sought for. On the other hand, the value of the relief is its value to the plaintiff and not necessarily the value of the property involved.

In the present case, leaving aside the declarations which by themselves do not affect the question of Court-fees, the consequential relief sought for is not recovery of the amounts which have been imposed, for they have not yet been realized—what has been realized is outside the scope of the suit—but a permanent injunction restraining the realization thereof by a particular process. There is no knowing whether by the said process the entire amounts yet unrealized will be realized. The value of the injunction to the plaintiffs is really the value at which the injury to the plaintiffs should be assessed. It is impossible to say that Rs. 5,100 is inadequate or arbitrarily low from that point of view, and so long as this cannot be said, the plaintiffs' valuation must necessarily be accepted under S. 7, Court-fees Act.

In fairness to the learned Subordinate Judge, however, it must be said that the view he has taken is founded upon statement which is contained in a petition filed on behalf of the plaintiffs who were on the record at one particular stage of the proceedings. The question however, is one of law and not of fact and it cannot be said that by that statement either they nor those who came in as plaintiffs afterwards are concluded.

We are accordingly of opinion that the rule should be made absolute. We set aside the order complained against and direct that the trial of the suit be proceeded with on the plaint as it stands. The costs of this rule—hearing fee being assessed at three gold mohurs—will be costs in the cause.

Judgment.—The facts which have given rise to the suit and this appeal are that the plaintiff was the owner of an elephant by the name of Lal Bahadur. Defendants 1 and 3 carried on the business of catching wild elephants and the plaintiff's case is that defendant 1 and his servant defendant 2 hired from her the elephant for the purpose of employing him in their business. There was an agreement between the plaintiff and defendants 1 and 2 of which the material portion was to the following effect:

I remain liable to pay to you Rs. 5,000 as the price of the elephant and Rs. 200 as the balance of the hire (money); if during the period the elephant remains in my possession, it be broken in health or becomes unfit for work or dies and I cannot return it to you at the stipulated time.

Under this agreement defendant 1 took possession of the elephant and used it for shikar or catching wild elephants in the Garo Hills up till the 29th December 1923 when it was found that the animal was ill and it died soon after. The plaintiff thereupon on the basis of the agreement brought the present suit for recovery of Rs. 5,000 from defendants 1 and 2. Defendant 1 in his written statement alleged that defendant 3 (the appellant before us) was a partner in the business and should have been made a party and that the suit should not proceed in his absence. Thereafter the plaintiff made an application in which she applied to make defendant 3 a party defendant and said that she was making the application on the objection taken by defendant 1 and as defendant 3 was an undisclosed partner in the business. The Sub-Judge before whom the application was made passed the following order:

The plaintiff makes an application to add Muthuranath Choudhury as a party. It occurs thus: He is a necessary party. Add him as a party. Issue summons."

On the body of the plaint the name of Mathuranath Choudhury, the appellant, was inserted at the heading under the names of the other defendants but no further alteration was made in the plaint either in the body of the plaint or in the prayers alleging facts against defendant 3 and seeking particular relief against him. The order adding defendant 3 as a party was passed after the settlement of issues in the case. The plaintiff, therefore, applied again to frame fresh issues with reference to defendant 3 and the following issues were added:

(a) Was defendant 2 an agent of defendant 3 Mathuranath Choudhury and was he authorized by defendant 3 to enter into the agreement with plaintiff? If not, is defendant 3 liable?

(b) Was defendant 3 partner of defendant 1 in the elephant catching business and as such liable to the plaintiff?

Defendant 3 in his written statement denied any knowledge of the agreement with the plaintiff and otherwise supported defendant 1 in his contention that no decree could be passed in the suit. The parties went to trial and evidence was adduced on both sides and it appears that it was admitted by defendant 3 that he was a partner of defendant 1 in the business. The trial Court decreed the suit against all the defendants jointly. On appeal by defendant 3 the learned District Judge of the Assam Valley District maintained all the findings of the trial Court and dismissed the appeal. Defendant 3 appeals before us and it has been contended on his behalf, firstly, that the suit should not have been decreed as against him as the plaintiff was not properly amended and no relief was asked against him by the plaintiff in the plaint. The objection was not specifically raised in any of the Courts below nor in the grounds of appeal in this Court. Moreover we do not think that there is any substance in it. The objection is a highly technical one and is fully covered by S. 99, Civil P. C. There has been no failure of justice on account of the omission in asking for a particular relief against defendant 3. By the addition of defendant 3 as a defendant to the suit the plaintiff intended to claim a decree against him as well, being a partner in the business, for the conduct of which the defendant was let out. This objection must, therefore, be overruled.

It is next argued that defendant 1 exceeded his authority in entering into an agreement like the present. This objection should also be overruled on the ground that it was not taken in any of the Courts below; and it is an objection which must be decided on the evidence and on the facts of the case. The learned Subordinate Judge in dealing with the liability of the appellant under S. 251, Indian Contract Act, observed that not a word was said in the written statement to suggest that he was not liable for or was not bound by the act of defendant 1 and that the said act was not necessary for the business. The ground upon which this portion of the appellant's case has been placed before us is that the condition to pay the sum of Rs 5,000 in the event of the elephant being lost was an unusual condition into which defendant 1 entered without obtaining a valid authority from his partners; and he is, therefore, personally liable and not the other partners of the business. There is nothing on the record to support this contention except the fact that in some agreements by which elephants were hired for the business defendant 1 made different stipulations. There does not seem to be anything unusual in the agreement before us. It has been found upon the evidence that the plaintiff was not willing to let out the elephant, but on the insistence of the defendants she agreed to do so on condition that she must be paid Rs. 5,000 if the elephant died or disappeared. It is also found that the elephant was a trained elephant for the purpose of catching wild elephants.

It has been strenuously argued that on the agreement defendant 3 cannot be made liable, firstly on the ground that the agreement was with defendant 1; and, secondly, because it has not been proved that it was in the course of the partnership business that this contract was entered into. It is said that the agreement was with defendant 1. (We may leave out of consideration defendant 2 as he was merely a servant of defendant 1, though an ex-parte decree was passed against him) and for this construction of the agreement reliance has been placed upon the case of Kush Kanta v. Chandra Kanta (1). In that case the law which is so well known was thus laid down:

The bailee is responsible to the bailor for loss, destruction, or deterioration of the bailed property upon his failure to return the same according to contract upon the expiry of the term of business; an action of trover is maintainable against a bailee where he fails to re-deliver the bailed property or to deliver it over in accordance with the terms of the contract.

On the particular facts of that case it was held that a partner who was not a party to the agreement should not be made liable though the contracting defendant took the elephant and employed it for the purpose of the business of the company and which contract the company refused to execute to the knowledge of the plaintiff. On these circumstances it was held that no other partner of the business besides the contracting defendant might be made liable under the agreement though the hire was for the benefit of the partnership business. That case, therefore, does not support the defendant's contention and if it is carefully scrutinized it goes a great way to help the plaintiff's case. Reliance has also been placed upon the decision in the case of Ram Chandra Sahu v. Kasim Khan (2) the head-note of which is to the following effect:

(1) A. I. R. 1924 Cal 1056.

(2) A. I. R. 1925 Cal. 29.

The liability of the dormant partner extends only to sums borrowed by the active partner in his capacity as a member of the firm. The ultimate use by the firm of money borrowed by one of its members individually on his own credit does not render the firm liable for the loan.

In that case, it appears that the borrowing defendant was a partner of the firm and had also other business in which he was interested. He borrowed some money on his own account and in his own name. He found subsequently that the defendant firm was in need of pecuniary help and the money he had borrowed he employed for the business of the firm. In these circumstances the learned Judge held that the firm or all the members constituting the firm could not be made liable for the money thus borrowed, as it was not borrowed originally for the purposes of the firm by the borrowing defendant as a partner of it and was not also so borrowed with the knowledge of the plaintiff. The learned Judges also observed that where one member of a partnership borrowed money upon his own credit by giving his own promissory-note for the sum so borrowed and subsequently used the proceeds of the notes in the partnership business, of his own free will, without being under any obligation to or to contract with the lender so to do, the partnership was not liable for the loan. The substance of the matter is whether the firm is liable for the money borrowed by one of its partners is pre-eminently a question of fact and depends upon the circumstances of each particular case.

With regard to the liability of defendant 3, if it be conceded that the money was borrowed and spent for the purpose of the business, there can be no question on the law as embodied in the Indian Contract Act and laid down by innumerable cases. Under S. 251, Contract Act, the appellant is liable if the act of defendant 1 was necessary for or usually done in carrying on the business of the partnership of which he was a member. It is not the appellant's case that defendant 1 did not act as a partner or his act was one which could be brought under the exemption to S. 251. As to undisclosed or dormant partner the law is clear. The leading case upon this point is the case of Pater-son v. Gandasequi (3), where the law is thus laid down :

If the principal be not known at the time of the purchase made by the agent, it seems that, when discovered the principal or the agent may be sued at the election of the seller ; and it was observed in that case that a dormant agent might be assimilated to a dormant partner where though the party furnishing goods to the ostensible partners intended at the time to give credit only to them, yet he might afterwards pursue his remedy against the dormant partner, when discovered. S. 251, Contract Act, which contains the law of partnership controls the relation between partners which is similar to the relation between principal and agent : and under S. 231, Contract Act, the principal is as much liable for the act of the agent himself. It cannot therefore be said that on the contract as it stands and on the findings of fact arrived at by the Court below defendant 3 is not liable under the agreement made between the plaintiff and defendant 1.

The last point taken by the appellant is that the sum of Rs. 5,000 stipulated to be payable to the plaintiff on the loss of the animal was in the nature of a penalty and the Court should have enquired as to the real value of the elephant and passed a decree accordingly. This point also was not raised in any of the Courts below and consequently there has been no enquiry as to the value of the animal. In the agreement the value of the elephant was given as Rs. 5,000 and it was stipulated that if the defendant failed to return the animal to the plaintiff he would pay Rs. 5,000 as the value of the animal. To the agreement as it stands S. 74, Contract Act, has no application. It is a simple agreement. The plaintiff said that she would part with her thing if the defendant guaranteed to pay a certain amount if the thing was lost. It was not a case of a breach of contract or the non-performance of any particular agreement by the defendant. It was a sort of contract on hire with the reservation that if the article is not returned the value stipulated in the agreement should be paid to the owner. In our opinion this contention fails.

The result is that all the points urged on behalf of the appellant fail and this appeal is dismissed with costs. The appellant will pay full costs to the plaintiff respondent Bageswari Rani and half costs to defendant 1, respondent Bhagyamal Bama. We make no order as regards costs in favour of defendant 2, respondent.

Rule 860 (S) of 1926.

This Rule was obtained from this Court by defendant 1 respondent for the purpose of transporting that defendant-respondent to the category of appellant on the ground that he apprehended that the plaintiff and the appellant might collude and did not place the case properly before the Court. Such contingency has not arisen and the learned advocate for the defendant does not press the application. The Rule is accordingly discharged Appeal No 96 of 1927, Decided on 14th June 1927, from the appellate order of the 2nd Additional District Judge, 24-Perganas, D/- 31st January 1927.

(a) Civil P. C., O. 21, R. 22—Sub-R. 2 does not abrogate the mandatory nature of the provisions of sub-R. 1.

Omission to issue notice to the judgment-debtor as required by O. 21, R. 22(1) renders the subsequent proceedings in execution void and sub-R. 2 does not abrogate the mandatory nature of the provisions of sub-R. (1). 44 Cal. 954, and A. I. R. 1924 Mad. 431, (F. B.), Foll.

(b) Limitation Act, Art. 181—Application to declare a sale in contravention of O. 21, R. 22(1), Civil P. C., is governed by Art. 181 and not by 166.

An application for declaring that a sale in execution is void for non-compliance with Civil P. C., O. 21, R. 22(1), not being an application to set aside the sale, is governed by Art. 181 and not Art. 166 : 27 C. L. J. 528 and A. I. R. 1924 Mad. 431, (F. B.), Foll.

(c) Civil P. C., O. 21, R. 22(1)—Notice served on judgment-debtor—Order dismissing application is not against judgment-debtor.

An order dismissing an application for execution on account of decree-holder not taking steps, though passed after the service of notice on judgment-debtor, is not an order against judgment-debtor.

Page, J.—This is an appeal from an order of the learned Additional District Judge of Alipur, reversing an order of the Subordinate Judge of Alipur whereby the learned Additional District Judge set aside a sale under O. 21, R. 92, and also held that the application for execution was barred under S. 47, Civil P. C. As regards the application under O. 21, R. 90 it appears that the applicant was the widow of the judgment-debtor, and the learned Judge held that there was a deliberate and fraudulent suppression of the notices required by law on the part of the decree holder, and that by reason of such suppression the applicant had sustained substantial injury. Upon these findings the learned Judge set aside the sale under O. 21, R. 92. The case for the appellant has been presented to us in an exhaustive manner by Mr. Roy Chowdhury, and in respect of the order passed under R. 92 the learned advocate has contended that inasmuch as the application was not made within 30 days of the sale it was barred by limitation and that as there was no express finding that the applicant was prevented from making her application in time by reason of the fraud of the decree-holder the application under O. 21, R. 90 was barred. Now, in her application the applicant not only set out that there had been deliberate suppression of all necessary processes but added that she was an illiterate pardanashin lady, and that she knew nothing about the proceedings until she was informed by her father at a date after the time had expired within which her application under O. 21, R. 90 should have been made. In my opinion, having regard to the ruling in Rahimbhoy Habibhoy v. Turner (1) and Ram Kinkar Tewari v. Sthiti Ram Panja (2) this contention raised on behalf of the appellant must fail. In those circumstances the order in so far as it was based upon O. 21, R. 92, is confirmed.

In her petition the applicant also claimed that the judgment creditor's application for leave to issue execution was barred by limitation. It was alleged by the applicant that the application for leave to issue execution was made long after the decree in the suit had become obsolete by the lapse of time. The learned Subordinate Judge appears to have thought that this allegation on the part of the petitioner amounted to an allegation that the claim upon which the decree was passed was barred by limitation, and he stated that in execution proceedings he could not go into that matter. Of course in so holding he was taking the right view. But that was not the allegation that was made; which was that the application for leave to execute the decree was made so long after the decree had been passed that it was barred by limitation. In the memorandum of appeal to the learned District Judge the applicant based her second contention both upon the general ground that the application for leave to issue execution had been made long after the execution had become barred, and also upon the more narrow ground that the application for execution was not made within a year from the date of the decree nor within a year from the date of the last order against the party (that is the applicant) against whom execution was applied for, and inasmuch as no notice was served upon the applicant as required by O. 21, R. 22, the application for execution was void and of no effect. The learned District Judge without coming to a definite conclusion upon the wider ground upon which it was contended that the application for execution was barred, held that the execution was illegal upon the narrower ground upon which the applicant relied. In my opinion, in so holding the learned Additional District Judge rightly appraised the legal position of the parties. The decree was passed on the 25th February 1916 and an application for leave to issue execution was dismissed for default on the 26th November 1923. The application for leave to issue execution upon which the present proceedings are founded was filed on the 10th November 1924. Therefore unless the decree-holder could satisfy the Court that within a year prior to 10th November 1924 an order had been made against the party against whom execution was applied for under O. 21, R. 22 the application for execution was barred by limitation. Mr. Roy Chowdhury referred to three orders one of which was made on the 26th November 1923, and was to the following effect :

(1) [1893] 17 Bom 341=20 I. A. 1=6 Sar. 256 (P. C.).

(2) [1918] 27 C. L. J. 528=46 I. C. 221.

Notice returned after service. Decree-holder takes no further steps. So the case is dismissed.

The learned advocate contended that that order was an order against the applicant under O. 21, R. 22. All I need say in order to refute that contention is to set out the order itself. It cannot reasonably be suggested that the statement "Notice returned after service" is an order against anybody. It is even more unreasonable to suggest that the words

are an order against the judgment-debtor or within the meaning of O. 21, R. 22

Two later orders were referred to. But these orders which relate solely to an application for review of an order dismissing the execution case did not purport in any sense to be orders directed against the judgment-debtor or the applicant. What is the effect of process in execution being issued without the notice which must be served under O. 21, R. 22? Before the passing of the Civil P. C. in 1908, it had been held by the Privy Council that the effect of issuing processes without complying with the provisions of O. 21, R. 22 was that the execution proceedings were void. The decision in Raghunath Das v. Sunder Das Khetri (3) was according to reason and good sense, if I may be permitted to say so, and that decision was that after a year had elapsed from the date when the decree had been passed it was only fair to the judgment-debtor that he should be given notice of the application for leave to execute a decree in order that he might have an opportunity of showing cause why the process should not be issued against him; otherwise it might happen that a dishonest decree-holder would be able to snap an order granting leave to execute the decree from the Court and attach the debtor's property without the debtor having an opportunity of questioning the regularity or the fairness of the execution. In 1908, sub-R. (2), R. 22 was added, and it was strenuously contended by Mr. Roy Chowdhury that the effect of that proviso was fundamentally to alter the whole complexion of O. 21, R. 22, because as he urged, if once discretion is given to the Court to issue or not to issue execution the failure to comply with the machinery of sub-R. (2) is a mere irregularity. Is that a sound argument? In my opinion, a perusal of sub-R. (2) shows that the intention of the legislature was to maintain the necessity of a notice under sub-R. (1) and that the legal position of the parties concerned should remain unchanged except in cases where the terms of sub-R. (2) are complied with. The object of passing sub-R. (2) apparently was that there might be rare cases where insistence upon a strict compliance with sub-R. (1) might work hardship. It might be imperative in order that justice should be done that execution should be levied forthwith. It would not be difficult to enumerate instances in which the necessity for immediate execution would arise in order that justice should be done. It was to meet such exceptional cases that the legislature passed sub-R. (2). But, in my opinion, it was not intended by enacting sub-R. (2) that the mandatory nature of the provisions of sub-R. (1) should be abrogated, and as we read the amended rule the legislature intended that the status quo ante of sub-R. (1) should be maintained except under special circumstances in which "for reasons to be recorded" the Court should think in order that justice should be done that it ought to issue execution without notice under sub-R. (2). That, in my opinion, is the true construction of R. 22 apart from authority. But this construction is in consonance with the interpretation of R. 22 as amended by the Calcutta High Court in Syam Mandal v. Sati Nath Banerjee (4) and a Full Bench of the Madras High Court in Rajagopala Aiyar v. Ramanujachariar (5).

The result is that the execution proceedings founded upon the application of the 10th November 1924, are void. The sale took place on the 13th July 1925, and the petition upon which the order under review was found was filed on the 4th December 1925. The learned advocate for the appellant strenuously urged that the petition was out of time because it was an application to set aside a sale under S. 47 of the Code, and, therefore, must be brought within thirty days of the sale under Art. 166, Limitation Act. The fallacy underlying that contention, I think, is that although it is an application under S. 47 and, therefore, under the Code it is not an application to set aside a sale as is the other branch of the application under O. 21, R. 90. For the sale being void need not have been set aside at all, and the order as passed was in substance merely a declaration that the sale was null and of no effect. For an application of that nature there is no special provision among the articles in Sch. 1, Limitation Act. It needs must come under the residuary Art. 181, and if Art. 181 is applicable the present application was within time. That appears to me to be clear on principle and it is also concluded by authority. See Ram Kinkar Tewari v. Sthiti Ram Panja (2) and Rajagopala Aiyar v. Ramanujachariar (5).

The result is that the order appealed from is varied by striking out the words "on the above consideration." In other respects the appeal is dismissed with costs the hearing fee being assessed at two gold mohurs.

This order is passed without prejudice to any right which the parties may possess inter se in respect of the premises that are the subject-matter of the present proceedings.

Judgment.—Having heard the learned counsel who appeared in support of the rule and the learned vakil for the judgment-debtor, we are satisfied that the order made by the Subordinate Judge on the 7th March 1927, was not in accordance with law. In the first place, there was no evidence before him on which it was possible for him to arrive at the decision that the judgment-debtor was a person, who for any "other sufficient cause" within the meaning of O. 21, R 40, was unable to pay the amount of the decree. The mere statement made at the bar to the effect that he was owner of landed property is insufficient for the purpose. In the next place, it was clearly wrong for the learned Subordinate Judge to release the judgment-debtor on his personal security, which was absolutely ineffective. Order 21, R 40, sub-R. (3) provides that the Court may release the judgment-debtor on his furnishing security, which means furnishing proper security and not the illusory security with which the learned Subordinate Judge has been satisfied.

We, therefore, set aside this order and direct the judgment-debtor to surrender at once before the Subordinate Judge, 3rd Court, Hooghly, who will then consider, on proper materials being placed before him, whether he should be committed to jail or released, and if released, upon what security; the learned Subordinate Judge must comply with the provisions of O. 21, in the matter of security. We also draw the attention of the Subordinate Judge to the mandatory provisions of S. 55, Civil P. C.

We may say here that the learned vakil for the judgment-debtor states that his client is willing to furnish security. The opposite party will pay the costs in this rule to the petitioner.

Roy, J—This appeal is by defendant 1. The suit brought by the plaintiffs was one for recovery of possession of a certain plot of land on establishment of their title and also for correction of an entry in the record-of-rights. The plaintiffs' case was that this plot of land was plot No. 2732 of the zemindari's chitta prepared in 1234 B. E. It was at one time chakran land. The "chakran" was resumed, and thereafter the land was settled with Rowson Mamud Haldar, the predecessor-in-interest of defendants 4 to 8 in the suit. One Fazal Bhangi took settlement of the disputed land from the heirs of Rowson Mamud Haldar and, in execution of a money-decree obtained against him and the sale thereunder, the land was sold and purchased by the plaintiffs. The defendant is the gantidar of Beel Pabla and it was said in the suit that he dispossessed the plaintiffs and got himself wrongly recorded in the settlement "khatian" which was prepared in 1918. The plaintiffs brought a suit soon after the final publication of the record of rights and there was a local enquiry made by a pleader commissioner who prepared a map and submitted his report. But the suit was withdrawn with liberty to bring a fresh suit. The plaintiffs brought this fresh suit in 1921.

The settlement record states that the land in suit is in Beel Pabla. The chitta of 1234 describes the plot as situated in mouza Lata. It appears that mouza Lata, Mouza Beel Pabla and another mouza are all within Dehi Pabla which goes under one Touzi. The defence was a denial that the disputed land was identical with plot 2732 of the chitta of 1234 and a denial of the tenancy of Rowson Mamud Haldar and the subsequent lease to Fazal Bhangi and of the plaintiff's purchase. The landlord happens in this case to be the Syedpur Trust Estate, the agent of which estate is the Collector of Khulna and he is a party to these proceedings. He also filed a written statement in which he supported the plaintiff's case in part in that he stated that there was a wrong entry in the record-of-rights. He denied any knowledge of the plaintiffs, but he said that Rowson Mamud Haldar's heirs should have been recorded as tenants under Syedpur Trust Estate.

The suit was tried by the trial Court. A number of witnesses were examined and the pleader commissioner who had made the local investigation in the previous suit which was withdrawn was also examined and he proved the map which he had prepared in the previous suit and also deposed that he had made the particular report which was before the Court. It appears that in the trial Court the map and the report were admitted without objection. An objection was taken that the evidence which the pleader commissioner had recorded should have also been put in as, without the evidence, the report was of little value. This has been considered by both the trial Court and the lower appellate Court and they are of opinion that the absence of that evidence detracts to some extent the value of the map and the report. The learned Munsif came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs had established their case and he thereupon gave the plaintiffs a decree. Defendant 1 appealed and the learned Additional District Judge who heard the appeal affirmed the decision of the trial Court; and defendant 1 has now come up here in second appeal.

A number of objections have been taken by the learned vakil who has appeared for the appellant. One of his points is that the chitta of 1234 is not admissible and in support of his argument he refers to the case of Ram Chunder Sao v. Bunsseedhar Naik (1). As a matter of fact all that was held in that case was that chittas prepared by Government for their khas mahal are not public documents. The question whether chittas were admissible under the Evidence Act was not considered in that case. Any commentary on the Evidence Act will tell us that chittas are admissible under appropriate sections of the Evidence Act. What their value should be is a matter to be determined by the Court in the particular circumstances of the particular case. As a matter of fact these chittas were admitted without any objection. Even in the grounds of appeal no objection was taken to their admissibility. The argument, therefore, has no substance.

The second objection of the learned vakil is that the lower appellate Court and apparently the trial Court also, because the Munsif had argued on the same line, have made an error in admitting a kabuliyat executed by Waresh and Fazal Sheikh in favour of Priyanath Majumdar and have wrongly relied on the boundaries mentioned in the kabuliyat. These are statements made by a third party and cannot be accepted as was held in the case of Brojo Mohan Das v. Gaya Prosad (2). There is that defect in the judgment of the two lower Courts. But as a matter of fact the son of Priyanath Majumdar was examined in the case and he deposed that this kabuliyat with these boundaries was accepted by his father and he also deposed positively that the two plots mentioned in that kabuliyat are one on the east and the other on the west of the disputed land. There is independent evidence, therefore, on the matters dealt with by the learned Additional District Judge. Apart, therefore, from the kabuliyat there is evidence of the facts on which he has relied.

Then the learned vakil has challenged the map and the report of the Commissioner which were admitted by the Munsif who tried the suit. It is, no doubt, correct that a map and a report of a commissioner who made a local enquiry can be evidence only in the suit in which he made the enquiry. That was held in the case of Denobundhu Ghose v. Nistarini Dassi (3). But in this case the report and the map were not taken into evidence by themselves as contemplated in the Civil Procedure Code, but they were taken in under the Evidence Act on being proved by the person who made them, that is the pleader commissioner who made them was examined in this case and he deposed that the map and the report were made by him and they were then marked as exhibits. As a matter of fact it does not appear that in the trial Court there was any objection taken to the admissibility of this map and the port.

(3) 12 C. L. R. 50.

(1) [1883] 9 Cal. 741.

If the defendant was really anxious that these documents should not go in, he should have objected at once and the learned Munsif could have ordered a fresh enquiry and put matters right. But his contention in the Court below was that they were of little value, in the first place, because the evidence which the commissioner had taken was not put in and in the second place because the commissioner was unable to remember anything except what he had written in his report. The Courts below have observed that the value of the map made by the commissioner and the value of his report suffer by the exclusion of the evidence that the commissioner had recorded. The lower appellate Court, however, has taken into account other facts in considering the value of the map and the report. He has observed, for instance, the broad features depicted by the commissioner and he has noted that they were consonant with the settlement map. After a prolonged discussion of various possibilities of the case both the Courts have come to this finding that plot 2732 of Chitta of 1234 has been identified with the land in suit and that it has been established that it was in the possession of Fazal Bhangi as tenant under the heirs of Rowson Mamud Haldar and that the plaintiffs have succeeded to that interest. On these findings it follows that the entry in the record of rights is incorrect. This is really a finding of fact and we do not see how that finding of fact can be interfered with in second appeal. The only way suggested by the learned vakil is that the case should be sent back to the lower appellate Court and a fresh local enquiry should be made. I do not think that this should be allowed at this stage. The defendant could have asked for a fresh local enquiry in the trial Court but he did not do so. He challenged the value of the commissioner's report. Both the lower Courts have come to the finding that it has some value, and that taken along with the other facts of the case it has established the plaintiffs' case.

The learned vakil has taken another objection, namely, that the plaintiffs are not at liberty to pursue their remedy in to another person's land. It is based on the argument that in the Chitta of 1234 the land was described as situated in Mouza Lata while the land in suit is situated in Mouza Beel Pabla and it is so recorded in the settlement map. But when the plaintiffs have shown that this particular plot situated in Beel Pabla is really their land, there is no reason why they should not be allowed to retain it. It would appear from the evidence in the case that the disputed land is situated close to a place where three mouzas meet together. It is quite possible that at the time of the Chitta it was thought that it lay within the Mouza Lata though it has now been found that it is really situated in Mouza Beel Pabla. It is true that defendant 1 is the gantidar of Beel Pabla, but as it has been pointed out, the defendant got his lease of ganti of Beel Pabla on the stipulation that he would not disturb any of the existing tenancies. It has been found that the tenancy of Rowson Mamud Haldar was created before defendant 1 got his ganti.

On these grounds, I think, there is no case for our interference. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Rankin, C. J.—This is an appeal by the Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company Limited against a decree whereby they have been ordered to pay compensation to the plaintiff in respect of non-delivery of part of two bales of piece-goods. It would appear that the goods in question were forwarded in two consignments delivered to the Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company at the Victoria Terminus in Bombay in November and December respectively of 1920. For the present purpose it need only be stated that these goods were consigned upon the terms of the risk-note B—a form of note approved by the Governor-General in Council under S. 72, Indian Railways Act (9 of 1890)

The first question which has been raised by the railway company in this appeal has reference to the point decided against it in the lower Court that the risk-note B is not applicable to the case. The contention that the risk-note is not applicable to the case arises out of the circumstance that the person who actually tendered the goods to the railway company for carriage signed his name on behalf of C. Karnani in the place provided for the signature of the sender. The Courts below have held that as it is not shown that he had authority of the sender to sign his name the risk-note is invalid and does not apply in the present case. That contention which is of great importance to the railway company and which no doubt accounts for this matter being brought before this Court I do not think it necessary to decide. I will only say that it seems to me that there is much to be said on behalf of the railway company before such a contention can be accepted.

I pass from that matter because, in my judgment, that important question does not arise at all. We ought not, therefore, to decide it.

Assuming that risk-note B applies, the learned advocate for the respondent contends that the judgment of the lower appellate Court is right in this respect that the burden was on the railway company, independently altogether of the exception clause in the form, to show that there had been a loss of part of these two bales in the present case. Now, when one turns to risk-note B, one finds that it is a limit put up on the general liability of the railway company. That general liability is not the liability known to English common law as the liability of common carrier, but the liability of a bailee as defined in S. 152 and S. 161 of the Contract Act; in other words, the railway company is not an insurer, but is under the duty of taking a certain measure of reasonable care. The purpose of risk-note B is to provide that notwithstanding there may have been a breach of duty to take reasonable care, the railway company shall not be liable for certain things except in certain special cases. The form says that the railway company shall not be legally liable for the following things, or any of them, namely, "any loss, destruction, or deterioration of or damage to the said consignment."

There is an exception which does not apply in the present case at all because to come within that exception there must be a loss of a complete consignment or of one or more complete packages.

But although that exception does not in the present case apply the language of it throws some light upon the meaning of the previous words in the form, upon the meaning in particular, of the words "any loss," in the previous part of it. The exception speaks of a loss due either to the wilful neglect of the railway administration, or to theft by or to the wilful neglect of its servants, and so forth. It is clear, therefore, that as the word "loss" is used in the form there may be a loss although it is caused by theft of the servants of the railway administration or its agents, and there may be a loss although it is due to wilful neglect of the railway administration itself.

We have, therefore, to apply in the light of the language used in the exception the phrase any loss, destruction or deterioration of or damage to, the consignment. .

If the plaintiff's claim were for damages for the railway company's damaging the consignment, damages for the deterioration of the goods comprised in the consignment or damages for the destruction of the consignment, then prima facie the contract itself would be a complete answer and the plaintiff could not get on at all unless he got on under the exception clause. The plaintiff's claim in the present case is for damages for non-delivery of part of the consignments and the questions arise, first, whether it is necessary that it should be shown that there has, in fact, been a loss of part of the consignment and, secondly, whether the burden of showing that there has been a loss is on the railway company or on the plaintiff. Both these matters are covered by decisions of Courts co-ordinate with this Court. The form says that the railway company is to be harmless and free from all responsibility for any loss and, therefore, it is prima facie for the railway company to bring itself within that warranty. It is not necessary in the present case to endeavour to define what circumstances would come under the word "loss." If, for example, the railway company by negligence or mistake had parted with the goods to wrong consignee I am very far from holding that that would not be "loss" within the meaning of the section. If the railway company still had the goods under its control and could have produced them or if the railway administration had converted them to its own use as distinct from some servant of theirs converting them in wrong of his masters to his own use, again it would not appear that the circumstances would be covered by the phrase "any loss." It is, however, necessary for the railway company, to get the benefit of this warranty, to show that the goods are lost, at least to show in the first instance that the goods are not then and there in the control of the railway administration, so that they might have been delivered to the proper consignee. In my judgment, therefore, on both the propositions—the necessity of showing that there has been a loss and that the initial burden of proof is on the railway company the cases which I shall now refer to have to be followed.

The first case is the case of Ghelabhu Punsu v. E. I. Ry. Co., (1), which was a decision of Chief Justice Sir Norman Macleod and Mr Justice Shah. That case proceeds upon certain English cases and upon a previous Bombay case decided by Mr Justice West in 1883. It definitely lays down the principle that the burden is on the railway company to show that the goods have been lost. Mr Justice West's language is this :

The natural presumption under such circumstances is that all the goods arrived, and that the railway company was in a position to deliver them.

The reasoning of that case is followed by a Division Bench of this Court presided over by Mr Justice Suhrawardy and Mr Justice Page in the case of E. I. Ry. Co. v. Jogpat Singh (2) and it was this case which was really in the mind of the lower appellate Court which decided the present case. Again in the case of Gopiram Behariram v. Agents, E. I. Ry. and O. and R. Ry. (3), Acting Chief Justice Chatterjee and Mr Justice Cuming held that before the plaintiff is called upon to prove that the goods were lost by the wilful neglect of, or theft by, the railway servants, it must be shown that the goods have been lost; and unless the fact of the loss is admitted by the plaintiff, the onus is, in the first instance, on the railway administration to prove that the goods have been lost and it will be then for the plaintiff to show that the loss was due to the wilful neglect of, or theft by, the railway servants.

That statement of law does not take account of the fact that the exception clause in risk-note B, as it then stood, covered cases only where a complete consignment or package, part of the consignment, had been lost. Otherwise, it is in entire agreement with the other cases I have cited.

We have to consider whether we should depart from these authorities. In my judgment, it must be that the railway company seeking the advantage of the guarantee that they will be held harmless for certain things must have the duty, in the first instance, of bringing themselves within the language of that guarantee. I have considered whether the reasoning in the Bombay case and in the subsequent cases in so far as they proceed upon English cases and the Indian cases prior to the Indian Railways Act of 1890 should be dissented from on the ground that prior to 1890 in India and up to present time in England the liability of a railway in respect of goods in the absence of a special agreement would be that of a common carrier. No doubt, in the circumstances, it is easier to say that the burden of proof is, in the first instance, on the plaintiff. It seems to me, however, that where the general liability of a railway company is merely that of taking a certain measure of reasonable care it is still correct to say that prima facie, until certain other facts are proved, the railway company taking reasonable care of goods would have them at the end of the journey to deliver to the consignee.

Even although the railway company is not any longer a common carrier in India it is in my opinion, still right to say that the railway company, to get the benefit of the special contract in this risk-note, must bring itself under the terms of the warranty and prove, unless it is admitted, that there has been a loss. In my judgment, this consideration concludes the present appeal.

It has been pointed out that in the trial Court not much attention appears to have been paid to this particular point. It is not shown to us, however, that in the plaint there was any admission that the goods had been lost and the form of the issue is such that the railway company is not entitled to assume that it did not have to prove that the goods had been lost. No doubt, the point in many cases—and probably in this case—is a purely technical one. It may well be that the railway administration would have had no difficulty at all in showing that at the time these goods should have been delivered they were lost to the railway administration. The railway company must remember when defending suits under this risk-note what the law is. They must take proper measures to show at all events that the goods were lost to the railway administration at the time when they ought to have been delivered. In my judgment, that being so, this appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs. This judgment governs appeal No. 1124 which is also dismissed with costs.

Appeal No. 53 of 1925, Decided on 27th July 1927, from the appellate decree of the District Judge, Hooghly, D/- 12th September 1924.

(a) Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act, (11 of 1859)—Payment of land revenue—Appropriation—General law of appropriation will apply only in the absence of specific provision in the Act on the point—Contract Act, Ss. 59 to 61.

The general principles of appropriation as contained in the Contract Act can only be resorted to in the case of the matter of payment of land revenue, where there is no provision in the Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act (11 of 1859) itself which may be applicable to the case and nothing which would militate against their application. [P 71 C 1]

(b) Bengal Land Revenue Sales Act, (11 of 1859), S. 8 and Bengal Towzi Manual, Rr. 102, 110, 114 and 115—Non-compliance with rules makes sale for arrears invalid.

Where the proprietor of an estate sent the revenue payable by him by money order and the same was received by the Collectorate before the due date, but due to mistake in towzi number and name of the thana, it was not credited in the register and a note was made in the money order acknowledgment that due to discrepancy in the particulars of the estate the money was not credited and was kept in deposit, but the proprietor did not care to look at the acknowledgment and the estate was sold for arrears of revenue.

Held: that the question whether an estate is in arrears is not a mere matter of form but of substance—a legal position to be inferred from all the circumstances rather than a fact to be determined by a mere reference to the entries in the register as relating to the particular estate. [P 69 C 2]

Held: further, that if the clerks of the Collectorate did not make a reasonable effort after kist day had expired to find out what the remittance was meant for, they failed in their duty. [P 71 C 1]

There is no duty cast upon a remitter to be on the look out for the return of the acknowledgment or for any endorsement that may happen to be made therein, unless he is warned to do so, and non-compliance of the rules providing for a notice to the proprietor of the fact that the revenue was not credited, by the revenue authorities, would make the sale contrary to the provisions of the Act and must be annulled. Bijan Kumar Mukherji and Bhudeb Mukerji—for Appellant.

Harendra Kumar Sarbadhikari and Annada Charan Karkoon—for Respondents.

Mukerji, J.—The plaintiff who was successful in the Court of first instance but whose suit has been dismissed by the lower appellate Court has preferred this second appeal.

The suit was for setting aside a revenue sale, held on the 27th June 1921, in respect of Towzi No 1366/2 of the Hooghly Collectorate, named mehal Anantarampur in Pargana Balia, Thana Chanditala, District Hooghly. The towzi belonged to the plaintiff. The revenue payable for it is annas 14, and cesses annas 12 pies 9 only. The amount is due on the 28th March every year. The plaintiff sent the amount due for 1921 on the 18th March 1921, through the Post Office. It was received in the Collectorate on the 24th March 1921, but it was not credited in the proper register as in the money-order the number of the towzi was given as 66 and the name of the thana as Jangipara. The Collector's Office on receipt of the money noted on the acknowledgment that there was a discrepancy and so the money was kept in deposit in the Collectorate, and not credited in the accounts of the plaintiff's estate. This receipt came back to the plaintiff on the 3rd April 1921. The plaintiff's case was that he never cared to look into the receipt and only saw it after he had heard of the sale. The plaintiff heard about the sale after the time for preferring an appeal to the Commissioner was over. Hence he filed this suit.

The Subordinate Judge decreed the suit but that decree has been reversed, and the suit dismissed by the District Judge. The Subordinate Judge held that the sale was premature. The District Judge has held otherwise and has given very good reasons for his view. This view has not been seriously challenged before us and, in my opinion, rightly so.

The substantial question that has been argued before us is whether the estate was in arrears or not. The Subordinate Judge took the view that as the plaintiff had one revenue paying estate, viz., Anantarampur, the misdescription in the money-order could easily have been corrected and the towzi for which the money was meant could have been found out easily if the clerks in the Collectorate had taken some trouble. The District Judge on appeal expressed his view in these words:

Had the plaintiff cared to look into the receipt he would have learnt that the revenue was not credited in the proper register in his name and could have taken proper steps in the matter. It is admitted that he gave the wrong description in the money-order. There is no doubt that the plaintiff was to blame for all this. It was not the duty of the Collectorate clerk to find out the correct number. The fact that the money was not credited was notified in due course to the plaintiff. In these circumstances I hold that the estate was in arrears.

The idea underlying the decision of the learned District Judge is that it is the last word on the question as to whether the estate is in arrears or not, and unless the amount received by him has been credited in favour of the estate, the estate is to be treated as being in arrears. The question, however, is not a mere matter of form but of substance—a legal position to be inferred from all the circumstances rather than a fact to be determined by a mere reference to the entries in the register as relating to the particular estate.

At the outset it would be convenient to deal with an argument that has been advanced on behalf of the appellant that the case should be decided on the footing of the relations between a creditor and his debtor. The question whether the law regulating those relations does not apply to the realization of the land revenue arose in this Court in the case of Ganga Bishun Singh v Mahomed Jan (1). That was a case where the question arose in this form; whether, where payment of revenue was made with the express intimation that the payment was to be applied to the discharge of the revenue due for a particular instalment and it was received and acknowledged on that account, it was within the competency of the Collector, without the assent of the payer to appropriate the amount in discharge of an earlier instalment that was in arrears. This Court while holding in the affirmative observed as follows:

The Sale Law under Act 11 of 1859 is complete by itself and we are of opinion that the relation between the Government and the holders of estates liable to pay revenue under the Act stands on an entirely different footing from that on which the relation between the creditors and debtors is based, and that arrears of Government revenue are not a debt within the meaning of S. 59, Contract Act.

On appeal the Judicial Committee reversed this decision and answered the question in the negative and observed as follows.

Much was said in the argument about the bearing upon the present case of certain provisions of the Contract Act, relating to the appropriation of payments. Those enactments might perhaps have had a bearing upon the case, if the parties had not by their own actions placed the matter beyond doubt. The money in question in the present case was expressly paid to satisfy the January kist, and it was received and acknowledged on that account. It requires no statutory provisions to show that when money has been so paid and received and appropriated, it is not in the power of one of the parties to the transaction, without the assent of the other, to vary the effect of the transaction by altering the appropriation in which both originally concurred.

The question of the applicability of the law relating to creditor and debtor arose again in the meantime in the case of Jogendra Mohan Sen v Uma Nath Guha (2). That was a case where there was no appropriation by consent and the question arose whether the provisions of Ss 59 to 61, Contract Act, would apply. It was held that there being nothing specific on the subject in Act 11 of 1859, the general law, which is practically embodied in Ss 59 to 61, Contract Act, would apply.

If the general law applies, what is the position? A valid tender on a contract of debt is as much a performance and discharge of a debtor's duty as an actual payment. The amount having been received by the Collector and not appropriated to the payment of the arrear that was due in respect of the appellant's estate, it cannot be said that the appellant was in a worse position than a person who has made a tender in respect of the debt due. The requisites of a valid tender were all complied with in the present case except only one, namely that the debtor must declare upon what account the tender is made. In Harris' Law of Tender, p 19, it is said:

But it would, notwithstanding, always be for the debtor the wiser course, even where there exists but the single recoverable debt, to indicate to the creditor, at the time of the tender, the identity of the debt, in respect of which the tender is made. For, although the words of Lord Ellenborough that a payment of the exact amount of one of several debts would be irrefragable evidence to show that the payment was intended for that debt [per Lord Ellenborough in Marryatt v. White (3); see also Mayfield v.

Wadsley (4)] would, no doubt, apply with a force, if possible still more conclusive, where there existed but one recoverable debt, still the general commercial transactions of the creditor may be on a scale so extensive, so as to prevent an instant appreciation by him, of the circumstances attending the particular debt in question, and it would probably save misunderstanding and perhaps not a little trouble and expense thereafter, if the debtor at the time identified the debt in respect of which the tender is made.

In a case where a mistake is made at the time of the tender as to the number of the towzi and the name of the thana, the position is somewhat different from that of a debtor making a payment when he has only one debt due and is rather analogous to a case where several debts are due and no declaration has been made upon what account the tender is made or perhaps worse still because the Collector would not be justified in going by the name of the mahal any more than the towzi number, leaving aside the further complication that arises by reason of the name of the thana being wrong. The general law is as put by Knight Bruce, L J, in the case of Nash v Hodgson (5).

If a man sends money to another and that other receives it, the first point is what was the intention with which it was sent; and if that cannot be ascertained by direct proof, it must be got at by circumstantial evidence, and whatever is the intention that must prevail, unless only the other elects to return the money.

The creditor cannot appropriate in opposition to the debtor's expressed intention. The right of appropriation of the tender in the first instance is in the debtor alone. Where, however, the debtor has neither declared his intention regarding the appropriation, and where the circumstances surrounding the transaction, betray no indication of such intention, the right passes to the creditor but it does only on the failure of the debtor to exercise his prior right. Where debts exist and tenders have been made, but the transaction between the debtor and the creditor presents a prospect sterile of any indication from which it can veraciously predicate the intention of either of them, the law asserts an exclusive jurisdiction over the entire transaction and with that lofty scorn of heteronomy which always distinguishes its unfettered operations, proceeds to appropriate the tenders in accordance with those dictates of elevated reason which in the jealous record of leading cases, compel the proud concurrence of contemporary and the sacred submission of succeeding jurists (Harris on the Law of Tender, p. 33). These general principles, however, can only be resorted to where there is no provision in the statute itself which may be applicable to the case and nothing which would militate against their application. Where the money is in the hands of the Collector and the remitter has by his own act created a position which precludes the Collector from crediting the money in the accounts of any particular estate, the case attracts the operation of the statute itself, the relevant provision being that contained in S. 8, Act 11 of 1859. This section or rather the latter part of it which is directly applicable will be presently considered.

Before doing so, however, it would be convenient to dispose of another question that has arisen, viz., whether there was any duty cast upon the clerks of the Collector to endeavour to find out the correct estate for which the remittance was meant. The Subordinate Judge says :

Under the circumstances, although the plaintiff was in fault the clerk in question could detect it if he had taken some trouble.

The District Judge holds it was not the duty of the Collector's clerk to find out the correct number. In my opinion neither view is reasonable. So long as the declaration of the intention of the remitter as contained in the money-order coupon stood with the wrong number of the towzi and wrong name of the thana, it would be idle to think of being sure as to whether it was Mehal Anantarampur that was meant or any other mehal. Just before the sale, however, when possibly a few towziz were in arrears it was perhaps not difficult with a little effort to find out the real intention of the remitter. If the clerks of the Collectorate did not make a reasonable effort after kist day had expired to find out what the remittance was meant for they failed in their duty but the question we have to consider is not whether the sale need not have been made, but whether it was invalid or void by reason of its having been made contrary to the provisions of the Act.

Turning now to the latter part of S. 8, Act 11 of 1859 it runs thus :

No^o shall the plea that money belonging to he defaulter, and sufficient to pay the arrear of revenue due, was in the Collector's hand bar or render void or voidable a sale under this Act, unless such money stands in the defaulter's name alone and without dispute, and unless, after application in due time made by the defaulter, or after the written agreement provided for in S. 15 of this Act, the Collector shall have neglected, or refused on insufficient grounds, to transfer it in payment of the arrear of revenue due.

This section was considered by the Judicial Committee in the case of Balkishendas v. Simpson (6). The plaintiffs in that suit prayed to have a revenue sale set aside upon the following facts : They were the proprietors in possession of a separate five-annas share of a village till the date of the sale, viz., the 5th September, 1891. Down to 1884 the revenue payable for the said share was Rs 89 and odd. In the beginning of 1884 the Board of Revenue sanctioned a reduction of the revenue at Rs 82 and odd from Rs 89 and odd. The decision of the Board was communicated to the Collector by a letter in March, 1884, but the abatement was entered erroneously in the Collector's books in respect of another estate which belonged to some different owners. The result of this mistake was that while the revenue paid yearly by the plaintiff was duly credited in the Collector's books as it was paid, the plaintiffs were wrongly debited every year with Rs. 89 and odd instead of Rs. 82 and odd on account of the revenue payable by their estate. In consequence of this error on the debit side of the account, the books showed in March 1891, at the end of the revenue year 1890-91, the revenue of the plaintiff's estate as being in arrears ; whereas if the debts had been rightly made the books would have shown a balance of Rs. 44-15-3 at the plaintiff's credit. In that case their Lordships explained the latter part of S. 8 in these words :

It is enacted that the Collector's possession of the money belonging to the defaulter, shall afford no answer to the default, unless the money stood in the defaulter's name alone and without dispute, or the Collector has failed, after application by the defaulter, to impute his money towards payment of the revenue. The enactment has no application, except there be (1) default in the payment of the revenue, and (2) possession by the Collector of money of the defaulter not indisputably placed to his credit. But the appellants were not in default. All moneys paid by them have been correctly credited ; and their alleged default, which is a pure fiction, is based upon erroneous debit entries to which they were not parties.

(6) [1898] 25 Cal. 833=25 I.A. 151=2 C.W. N. 513=7 Sar. 363 (P.C.).

From these observations two propositions clearly emerge : first, that possession by the Collector of money belonging to the defaulter, not indisputably placed to the credit of a particular estate cannot save the estate from being sold : second, that in the event of the money received by the Collector being in his hands but standing not in the defaulter's name alone or not without dispute and on the defaulter having applied for such credit, if the Collector neglects or refuses to impute the money towards the payment of the revenue, the estate cannot be sold. As regards the first of these propositions so long as the number of the towzi and the name of the thana were wrongly stated, the intention of the remitter of the money was not clear to the Collector and it is only reasonable to hold that the money was not indisputably placed in the hands of the Collector for credit in respect of the appellant's estate. The Collector may very well have hesitated to credit it in respect of one estate rather than another, lest he might act contrary to the intention of the remitter. Here then the second proposition comes into operation and for its application it is necessary to give the remitter an opportunity of making an application for credit of the money for the revenue of the estate for which it was meant. To give him such an opportunity rules have from time to time been framed and it is the violation of these rules which deprives the remitter of an opportunity to have the money which is in the hands of the Collector imputed towards the payment of the revenue of the estate for which it was meant.

In the case of Hamid Hossein v Mukhdum Raza (7) there was infraction of R. 29 of the Land Revenue Rules then in force and this deprived the remitter of an opportunity to rectify the mistake that he had made as regards the number of the towzi and the name of the proprietor. To hold the sale of an estate for its arrears of revenue, the proprietor whereof had been deprived of a chance of correcting the mistake by reason of the non-compliance of the rule aforesaid, was held to be without jurisdiction, and the sale was accordingly set aside. In the present case the clerk of the Collectorate noted in the money-order receipt that there was a discrepancy and so the money was kept in deposit in the Collectorate.

The judgment of the District Judge states that the receipt reached the plaintiff on the 3rd April, 1921. Probably that was the date of the postal seal which the receipt bears. The appellant's case is that the receipt was in his house and that he saw the receipt after he had heard about the sale. The District Judge has believed this case of the appellant and has blamed him for his negligence. The point is, had the appellant notice that his remittance had not been credited because there was a discrepancy, for on this depends the question whether he had opportunity to rectify the discrepancy. To provide for this, very salutary rules have been framed and if these rules are strictly followed, the remitter will always have such notice.

Rule 102, para. 2, of the Rules of the Bengal Touzi Manual, 1918, runs in these words :

If owing to omissions or errors in the particular of remittance there is any uncertainty as to whether a remittance can be correctly credited according to the intentions of the remitter, a note should be made across the acknowledgment in red ink, stating how the remittance has been credited or what particulars are required, and in the latter case the remitter should be asked to send the required information immediately by letter.

Very stringent rules follow as regards the treatment of acknowledgments with red ink note. Rule 109 enjoins how the acknowledgments are to be distributed to postmen for delivery. Rule 110 says :

The postman or village postman will obtain the remitter's signature or mark when delivering each acknowledgment in the postman's book or the village postman's register.

Then follow some rules as regards undelivered acknowledgments. Rule 114 is a very stringent rule attaching responsibility to the Post Office for punctual and free delivery of acknowledgments. Rule 115 is very important and runs in these words :

Remitters of revenue money-orders should be advised to examine carefully their acknowledgments for the money-orders in case there should be any red ink note by the Collectorate calling for further particulars or indicating doubt as to whether a remittance has been correctly credited according to the intentions of the remitter.

These rules, if worked properly, will place the question of notice beyond the range of all possible doubts in any particular case. There is nothing to show and indeed it is not suggested that these rules, especially Rr. 110 and 115, have been complied with in the present case and, on the other hand, the ignorance of the appellant as regards the existence of the acknowledgment or its contents till after the sale was over has been believed by the District Judge. What is contended is that the appellant was negligent but it cannot be said that there is any duty cast upon a remitter to be on the look out for the return of the acknowledgment or for any endorsement that may happen to be made therein, unless he is warned to do so. The principle of the decision in the case of Hamid Hossein v. Mukdum Reza (7), therefore, applies to this case.

In my judgment the sale must, in the circumstances, be held to have been made contrary to the provisions of the Act and must be annulled. The appeal is allowed, the decision of the District Judge is reversed and that of the Subordinate Judge restored with costs in this Court and of the Court of appeal below.

Judgment.—This is an appeal against an order of the learned Subordinate Judge of the 24-Pargannas whereby he purported to grant an application to review an order dated the 6th August 1925.

A preliminary objection was taken to the maintenance of this appeal upon the ground that if this is an appeal against an order of review passed on an application under O. 47, R. 1, then an appeal will only lie upon the grounds set out in O. 47, R. 7. We are of opinion that the preliminary objection is pro tanto a good one and that in so far as the order under appeal is an order granting an application for review it is not subject to an appeal. But in our opinion, the learned Subordinate Judge in considering the application for review and in making an order thereon made an order which went beyond the scope of the application for review, because the application was to review the order of the 6th August 1925, whereby the report of a commissioner appointed to determine the boundaries of the land for purposes of the execution of the decree was sought to be set aside, and in passing the order under appeal the learned Subordinate Judge not only granted the application to review the order of the 6th August but went further and passed an order that the map and the report of the commissioner, the subject-matter of the order of the 6th August 1925, be accepted. That further order in our opinion he had no jurisdiction to make upon the application which was before him.

The result is that that part of the order which granted a re-hearing of the application which was the subject-matter of the order of the 6th August 1925, is confirmed and pro tanto this appeal is dismissed. But that part of the order which directed that the report and map of the commissioner be accepted cannot stand and must be set aside, and the proceedings will be returned to the learned Subordinate Judge in order that the application and the order thereon setting aside the final report of the commissioner may be reheard on the merits.

Costs of, and incidental to, this appeal, the hearing fee being assessed at two gold mohurs, will abide the result.

In the case of commendeering order there can be no ordinary commercial contract for sale and purchase, because one of the parties may be unwilling to surrender his goods and yet may be compelled under the commendeering order to do so. He has no option once the order has been made and issued. He is bound to place his goods at the disposal of Government when called upon to do so. The only right he has is that if he does not accept the price offered by Government he can have it settled by arbitration. The arbitrator's order is final. [P 81, C 2]

* (d) Government of India Act, S. 29—Payments made on contracts not in conformity with the Act, is no answer to render such subsequent contracts binding on Secretary of State—Contract must be in strict conformity with statute—Civil P. C. S. 49.

When a statute lays down certain mandatory provisions in regard to the framing of contracts between the Secretary of State and a private individual, it is no answer to say that because the provisions were ignored on particular occasions and payments were made on contracts which were not in conformity with the statute, that that should be taken as a precedent which will be binding upon the Secretary of State in every case. Contracts to be binding upon the Secretary of State, must be made in strict conformity with the provisions laid down in the statute. If they are not so made, they are not valid as against him.

N. N. Sircar, S. M. Bose and S. C. Roy—for Plaintiffs

Judgment.—In this suit Kessoram Poddar and Company sues to recover, from the Secretary of State for India in Council, Rs 23,35,835 together with interest Rs 10,44,613-4-0 being the loss and damage sustained by the plaintiff firm by reason of the defendant's failure and neglect to pay for or take delivery of certain goods bought by the defendant from it. The purchases are said to have been made by one Charles Sutherland Waite, an officer of the Indian Munitions Board, Bengal, on four dates, namely 4th, 14th, 17th June and 26th August 1918.

It appears that the Indian Munitions Board, Simla, was established on 1st March 1917 and the office of the Controller, Munitions, Bengal, was opened in June that year. Mr Peterson of the Indian Civil Service was the first Controller, being appointed on the 30th June. He continued to hold office till 19th April 1919. Under him were two Assistant Controllers, Mr. Nixon of the Indian Civil Service and Dr. Meek of the Educational Service. Nixon left office on 2nd February 1918. Meek succeeded Peterson on 19th May 1919. There were also four Deputy Controllers one of whom was Mr. Waite, who was appointed in November 1917 and went on leave on 23rd January 1919. His services were dispensed with on 20th February 1919.

The plaintiff firm opened their metal department in March 1918 and Mr A. H. Ghaznavi was in charge of it. From May 1918 Ghaznavi began calling on Waite for orders and it is alleged that prior to the purchases now in suit, he had received orders from Waite for goods costing Rs. 27 lakhs for which payment has been made

The plaintiff firm's case is that Waite's method of purchase was not to call for tenders from merchants having war materials to supply or to make out written contracts for such goods as he wished to buy but to take the list submitted by the firms (of whom there were at least 100 different European and Indian representatives), discuss the price and after discussion, put tick marks in pencil against such items on each list as he wanted, noting, in some cases, also the price agreed upon and that these tick marks indicated that he had bought the goods so ticked. Thereafter, when he wanted delivery of the goods purchased, he would send a delivery order through his office requiring the seller to deliver the goods at the Narcaldanga depot or at such other place as might be specified in the order, but owing to the congested state of the depots months often elapsed before such delivery orders were issued. He would also purchase goods by what was popularly known as a "commandeering" order. It appears that under the rules framed under the Defence of India Act, certain classes of goods such as corrugated iron sheets, galvanized plates, barbed wire and the like, could not be sold by merchants except under license from Government and when a commandeering order was issued, the goods had to be delivered at such places as were specified therein. Such an order could only be signed by the Controller of Munitions himself. In such cases the price of such goods was agreed upon but where there was a dispute, the price was ultimately settled by reference to arbitration. The restrictions under these rules were withdrawn in December 1918. Waite had authority to buy both for stock and indent and could buy ahead for stock on the basis of the previous three months' requirements. In the exercise of these powers the plaintiff firm says that on the four dates mentioned above, he purchased the goods from it in the manner indicated. In some cases, delivery orders were issued and the goods were delivered and paid for, but in the case of the rest, no delivery orders were issued though the plaintiff firm repeatedly asked for them and it was always ready and willing to deliver the goods. Subsequent to the 26th August, it is said, that there were further purchases by Waite from the plaintiff firm and it is also said that in September 1918, for instance, some scrap iron was bought and paid for.

The Armistice was signed in November 1918 and on 13th December 1918 Mr Keatinge Controller of Hardware, Metals and Implements, wrote to the plaintiff firm cancelling an order for seven items placed with them by Waite on 16th August 1918. The plaintiff firm replied on the 18th denying the Controller's right to cancel the order and giving reasons which the Controller declined in his letter to accept. To this the plaintiff firm replied on 3rd January 1919 :

The order was a contract and therefore delivery or non-delivery thereunder was to be regulated by the provisions of the law.

On the same date, Mr Peterson wrote :

the materials delivered at the time prior to the issue of the letter cancelling the order have been taken into account, but with regard to other materials it will be necessary for you to prove to the satisfaction of the Controller, Hardware, that these were in your possession when the letter cancelling the order was received by you.

The plaintiff firm apparently succeeded in satisfying Keatinge, as, on the 15th January, he wrote a letter in which the following expression occurs :

This will, as explained by your representative to me, complete all outstanding orders placed with you by the Deputy Controller, (that is, Waite.)

On 1st February 1919 the Controller in a circular letter to all English and Indian firms wrote as follows :

Would you kindly note that no deliveries should be made after the date of receipt of this letter or of any orders placed with you by the Deputy Controller (Inspection) without first of all making a reference to me and obtaining my permission.

The effect of this letter was to discontinue all deliveries. The plaintiff firm's case is that it does not affect the previous purchases made by Waite for indent although he had been forbidden on the 20th August 1918 from purchasing for stock. The plaintiff's case further is that in November 1918 they had received Waite's promise to take delivery of all goods purchased by him by July 1919. The question of limitation would, therefore, not arise as Waite admits that the dealers would hold the goods till he called on them for them. This he never did. The plaintiff firm through their attorneys, Messrs Morgan & Co., wrote a letter on 26th July 1919 to the Controller giving particulars of the goods alleged to have been purchased by Waite and threatening a suit in the event of necessary delivery orders not being issued. A copy of the letter was sent to the Financial Secretary, Government of Bengal, Secretary, Munitions Board, and Controller of Hardware. In their letter to the Financial Secretary, the plaintiff firm gave the requisite notice under S. 80, Civil P. C. Dr Meek, the new Controller, replied, on 29th July offering an interview but this offer was not accepted.

On the 22nd December 1919 the premises of the plaintiff firm were searched by the police, apparently with a view to prosecution, and all books and papers were seized. The documents were scrutinized by the authorities and Ghaznavi was asked for answers to certain inquiries which he gave. In the end no prosecution was launched. The papers were returned to the plaintiff firm in March 1922 and in the following June this suit was filed. The plaintiffs' case is that during all this time Government never repudiated their claim.

The Secretary of State in his written statement denies that Waite was his agent or was competent to bind him by the alleged purchases or that there was any contract between him and the plaintiff firm in fact or in law. He denies the purchases by Waite and the plaintiff's loss by reason of the breach of contract. He avers that in February 1919 the Munitions Board declined to receive goods or orders placed by Waite without reference to the Controller. Thereafter, the plaintiff firm had notice and the cause of action, if any, is barred by limitation.

In para. 10, he says that the transactions alleged can give rise to no cause of action against the defendant inasmuch as the same relate to the exercise of sovereign powers, namely, the purchase of munitions for the purposes of war, and do not relate to trade. In para. 11, he says that the formalities required by law to create a contract binding on the defendant have not been complied with. In para. 12, he says that for a considerable period prior to the transaction alleged in the plaint the plaintiff firm had been systematically defrauding the Government of India by supplying goods at exaggerated prices under false weights and measures and quantities and that the quotations put forward by the plaintiff firm as amounting to a contract were part and parcel of the same scheme of fraud and can give rise to no cause of action.

With regard to the allegations contained in this paragraph, they are further explained in the particulars furnished by the defendant in February 1925 as meaning that the plaintiff firm and Waite entered into a conspiracy to defraud Government in various ways by antedating the orders showing purchases by Waite purporting to have been made before his authority had been withdrawn and by short delivery.

The following issues were framed:

(I) Was the purchase of munitions for the war an act of State? Can any legal liability arise in relation to such purchase?

(II) Was there any legal and binding contract operating under S. 20, Government of India Act? If not, is there any liability on the defendant?

(III) Did Waite in fact enter into any agreement to buy the goods in the plaint mentioned?

(IV) If so, has such agreement any legal effect to bind the defendant?

(V) Did the said Waite agree also that delivery should be made when called for?

(VI) Did Mr. Waite, or any successor of his, promise that orders would be given in due course as alleged in paras. 3 and 4 of the plaint?

(VII) If issues 5 and 6 be answered in the affirmative, is defendant in any way affected thereby?

(VIII) Was there refusal to take any more goods, and if so, on what date or dates?

(IX) Is the suit barred by limitation?

(X) Was the statutory notice duly served?

(XI) Was the plaintiff ready and willing to perform?

(XII) Was there a fraudulent conspiracy to defraud the Munitions Board?

(XIII) To what damages, if any, is the plaintiff entitled?

The original lists upon which the present claim is based consists of 11 sheets of paper marked at Waite's examination on commission in London (Exs. 1A to K.) No. 1 is on a plain piece of paper in Ghaznavi's handwriting and the remainder are typewritten on the office paper of Kessoram Poddar and Co., 15, Clive Row Nos. 1, 3, 5, 6, 7, 9 and 11 bear tick marks or pencil lines indicating, according to the plaintiff's case, that all the goods so marked were purchased by Waite. Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 11 have various endorsements in Waite's handwriting which according to the plaintiff's case are his orders to the office how to deal with the goods thus purchased. (After dealing with evidence, his Lordship proceeded). I have given the evidence very close and careful attention, and in my judgment it discloses so incredible a state of things as not to be worthy of acceptance. Had it been a true account I have no doubt that the plaintiff firm could have produced many witnesses, respectable merchants, who had dealt with the Munitions Board during the time when it was in existence and who would unhesitatingly have come forward to say that goods were purchased in large quantities by Waite by no other means than by ticking lists and that there were no formal contracts or anything of the kind. It is plain that what the Munitions Board looked to by way of check upon purchases made were the delivery orders issued. They did not accept nor is there any record in the office books to show that they regarded purchases by ticking as real purchases. There is one thing which is perfectly evident and that is this: that if Ghaznavi had believed that he was making contracts for the sale of very large quantities of war material, he must have made entries in his own books. It has been said that Waite was unbusinesslike. Nobody can say that Ghaznavi was unbusinesslike, and for him to pretend that orders covering large sums would be treated with so little care as not even to merit an entry in his ordinary account books seems to me preposterous. The burden of proof in this case is on the plaintiff and upon the evidence before me I am not satisfied that he has succeeded in discharging that onus.

At the same time I think it my duty to say that the evidence which has been adduced on the side of Government is not satisfactory. With regard to the purchase, the only material witness examined on behalf of the Government is Waite himself. Keatinge's evidence, to which I shall refer later, does not deal directly with Waite's method of purchase although he deals with another question of importance. It seems to me that when the credit of an important branch of a Government department such as the Munitions Board, is assailed, it was the duty of Government to examine the superior officers who were in charge of that branch. Both Mr. Peterson and Dr. Meek were apparently available in Calcutta. As successive Controllers of the Board in Calcutta, they might be expected to know the procedure that obtained in the office. They could certainly have told the Court whether Waite's alleged practice of purchasing by ticking was authorized and whether goods were delivered and paid for accordingly. More important still, Peterson could certainly have told the Court whether Ghaznavi's interview with Waite was held in his presence and whether Waite's alleged promises were also so made. Even though it be found that the surrounding circumstances are sufficient to refute

Ghaznavi's allegations, the position would have been rendered more certain and infinitely clearer if there was Mr. Peterson's sworn evidence on the record that the allegations made were in fact wholly untrue. No doubt the determination not to put the controlling officers in the box was not taken without due consideration, but, in my judgment, the decision was unwise and lays Government open to charges to which it should not have been exposed.

As I say the only witness examined is Waite, who, according to the particulars furnished by the Government Solicitor, "has entered into a conspiracy" with the plaintiff firm "to defraud the Government." A party to a suit presumably calls a witness to represent him to the Court as worthy of credit. What is to be said when the witness is, according to the party's own showing, of no repute? It might perhaps be said that if he had not been called, an inference adverse to Government would have been inevitable, and it might perhaps also be said that as regards the transactions which form the subject-matter of this claim, no one else was competent to testify, but what reliance can be placed upon his evidence? Mr. Pugh intimated to the Court that he did not propose to call evidence to prove the alleged conspiracy between Waite and the plaintiff firm but that does not rehabilitate Waite. Can it be said, as Mr. Sircar for the plaintiff firm has put it, that on this occasion only he has spoken the truth? It is surely not open to Government to say that though he is disreputable he is still a witness of truth. At the highest his evidence can only be considered as showing that he is not the imbecile that Ghaznavi makes him out to be. (After referring to the evidence of Waite his Lordship proceeded.) Whatever his character may be, and howsoever little worthy of credit he may be in consequence, it is in my judgment plain that he had some sort of method in his conduct of business. He was not the incompetent fool Ghaznavi pretends. As I say, I can place no great reliance upon his evidence from the fact that he is obviously a man of no repute. At the same time what he says is reasonable and is, therefore, at all events more probable than what Ghaznavi had to say.

I now turn to the evidence of Mr. Keatinge who was examined de bene esse— on 3rd March last He was Controller of Hardware, Implements and Materials in 1918 and on 20th August he sent a telegram to the Controller, Calcutta :

Kindly instruct Minister and Deputy Controller, Inspection, not to make any further purchases of hardware implements and materials for stock without reference to me.

Waite was then the Deputy Controller, Inspection. A copy of this was sent to Mr. Nixon, the Assistant Controller, who sent it to Waite who initialed it on 22nd August (Ex. 2). Keatinge proves the correspondence which is to be found in part 3 of the brief between himself and the plaintiff firm. It begins with the letter of 13th December 1918, wherein he cancelled certain orders placed by Waite with them on 16th August and these are the first seven items on p 11 of the list of 26th August. This was followed by Kessoram Poddar's protest of 18th December and their letters of 3rd and 8th January 1919 and resulted in the revocation of the cancellation. This was contained in his letter of 15th January to Messrs. Kessoram Poddar & Co.:

The Assistant Controller in charge, Narcaldanga Depot, will take over such quantities of the material as you have delivered at the depot to date and the further lot which you hope to deliver at the depot next week at latest. This will, as explained by your representative to me, complete all outstanding orders placed with you by the Deputy Controller (Inspection).

The "representative" here mentioned... in the letter is admittedly Ghaznavi. (His Lordship dealt with the evidence of Mr. Keatinge and proceeded.) In commenting upon this evidence Mr. Sircar has referred to the entry on p. 11 of Exs 1 A to K : "Take this lot Rs. 64" : and he says that the seven items are covered by Keatinge's letter of 13th December 1918, and since they have been delivered and paid for by Government. Waite was, therefore, wrong when he stated that his pencil line was only against four items and had been subsequently extended to cover the remaining items on that page. As, therefore, fraud has no longer been pleaded by the Government as a defence to this suit, it must be taken to be admitted that the order for 200 tons and six other items of 160 tons is still outstanding. In reply, Mr. Pugh pointed out that delivery order No. 2814-A. (Ex. 4) bears date 16th August 1918 though the list was not handed to Waite till the 26th August.

In his letter of 13th December Keatinge purported to cancel all outstanding orders, but on the plaintiff's remonstrance he agreed to take delivery of the balance, not knowing that the delivery orders had been antedated and not suspecting any irregularity.

It is not for me to conjecture how nearly Rs 6½ lakhs of public money which was paid for these items was paid without a proper enquiry having been made, if not by Keatinge himself, then by some other competent officer. Had such enquiry been made it must have been evident that the order made on 16th August for delivery of goods which could not have been bought before the 26th August must have been antedated. Had the enquiry been pursued, it would have been discovered that Waite's authority to buy against stock was withdrawn on 20th August. Had the register been inspected, it would have been found that the order appears at the foot of a page and that the last preceding entry was No 2814 and the one that follows at the top of the next page was No 2815 and that this particular order had been numbered 2814-A. Had the register been more closely examined it would have been found that there were two other similar instances, namely, 2788-A and 2819-A, where a capital letter was added to the number of the delivery order that in both of these cases the order was inserted at the foot of the page and that both of them were in favour of Kessoram Poddar. The inference to be drawn is, in my judgment, irresistible that these orders were smuggled into the register to show that Waite had ordered the goods before he had been deprived of his authority and that a huge fraud had been perpetrated by the plaintiff firm upon Government in collusion with some one in the office. The orders were, however, passed as good orders and paid for, it being recognized that Waite's purchases by ticking were valid if they were followed by delivery orders.

With regard to Waite's note on p 5 of the list : "Have we met all demands," Mr. Sircar points out that ten tons were delivered and paid for. If the remark meant that he would not buy till he was satisfied that he had met all demands why should ten tons be taken ? Mr. Sircar's contention has been that the market was rising daily, so Waite, whether acting honestly or dishonestly, would be likely to buy in what he did not require in anticipation of a further rise when goods were actually required. In my view the construction which these words naturally bear are simply that Waite meant:

I want ten tons now, which I take; do we want any more?

Similarly, in regard to the first note "Have we demands for others, but 14," Mr. Sircar points out that there was a delivery order for five tons and that this purchase was by reason of the line against it. If that is so, it must follow that Waite bought all the items and having bought all the items asked the office whether any more were wanted. I should construe the words as meaning

I know there are demands for 14, do we want others than 14?

With regard to the aluminium ingots which appear on p. 6 of the list, Mr. Sircar points out that these were covered by delivery O. 2819-A (Ex 5) and paid for which shows that if there was a contract it must have been by ticking. Waite said that he was buying for indent which authority he retained till October 1918 (Q. 225), but that though he had originally intended to buy for indent, he had changed his mind subsequently and converted the goods so purchased to stock. There can be no doubt that these articles were purchased by tick marks followed by the antedated delivery order and that is also true of the galvanized plain sheets which is covered by delivery order No. 2788-A to which I have already referred.

There are thus two conflicting versions to be considered; the plaintiff's version that Waite made a purchase merely by saying "I take this" and putting a tick against the item he wanted, and Waite's version that he ticked off on the lists what he considered of interest or of importance for future use, but when he actually wanted to buy, he issued directions to his office "Take this," "Make out delivery order or commandeering order." Despite Waite's character I cannot, but hold that this is the more reasonable explanation and I think I may go so far as to say this that even if Waite's evidence be ignored, Ghaznavi's story is so improbable as to deserve no credence. That a man in charge of a Government department, however dishonest or however unbusinesslike he may be, would buy before he knew that the goods were wanted at all seems incredible. Waite could buy for stock based on three months' previous indents and also for indents which had not been executed and that no doubt is what he meant when he noted on 26th August "put up cases relating to these demands" or in other words "let me see the indents which have come in with the necessary orders." It is proved by Keatinge that the Munitions Board took no notice of anything else, but the actual delivery orders. Ghaznavi has no books to show that he regarded tick marks as indicating concluded purchases. He says that he has his copy of the list and that is enough for him, but as Mr. Pugh has pointed out, in the list attached to Messrs. Morgan & Co.'s letter of 24th July, the tick marks do not appear while in the list annexed to the plaint all Waite's remarks are not entered.

Mr. Sircar has urged that Ghaznavi's statement that 27 lakhs worth of goods had been taken over and paid for, has not been controverted. These goods were purchased by ticking Ghaznavi's earlier lists and the plaintiff firm has called upon the defendant to produce those lists and also Stoddart's private books. Nothing has been produced and no one has come from the office to swear that these books could not be found. This leads to an inference adverse to the defendant: Murugesam Pillai v. Gnanasambadha Pandara Sannadhi (1), Ram Prosad v. Raghunandan (2), Parthasarathy Appa Rao v. Secretary of State (3), and is in accordance with S. 114, Evidence Act.

I agree with Mr. Sircar that these lists were relevant to the enquiry and if in existence should have been produced. If they were not in existence there should have been some evidence on the defendant's side to prove it, but I am not prepared to infer from their non-production that a method of purchase was then in vogue which has not been established here. As I have said before, had it been a fact, Ghaznavi could have produced some trustworthy person from the hundred firms dealing with the Munitions Board to support him. Mr. Sircar next urges that there has been no repudiation of the contract alleged in Messrs. Morgan & Co.'s letter of the 26th July 1919. On the other hand, Dr. Meek in his reply on the 29th July, says:

I cannot question your statement in any way. I only want to see exactly what Mr. Waite has written.

It is necessary to read this letter.

In your letter you state that Mr. Waite has made some definite written remarks on certain papers which your clients hold. Would you very kindly ask your clients to bring all the papers to me, so that I may see exactly what Mr. Waite has written. I am not questioning your statement in any way, but only want to see the originals in order that I may decide what action to take. I shall be in office between 11 a. m. to 1 p. m. on any date this week, but if these hours are not suitable I shall be quite glad to make a definite appointment with your clients.

It is, therefore, clear that though at that time Dr. Meek could not, of course, question the statements made because he had not seen the papers he wished to see the originals to decide what action to take, and he offered to make an appointment with the plaintiff firm for the purpose at any time convenient to them. The plaintiff firm, however, took no note of the invitation, though, if the claim had been a genuine and true claim, the chance would obviously have been welcomed. That being so, to construe a courteous offer to make an appointment as being equivalent, if not to an acknowledgment of a contract or at all events to a non-repudiation, seems to me unwarrantable. The most emphatic repudiation lay in the action of Government when on the 23rd December the police seized all the plaintiff's books and papers evidently because they intended to see whether there was evidence sufficient to prosecute the firm criminally.

The next question is, Supposing as a fact Waite had purchased goods by ticking, had he authority to do so? Is his act binding on the Secretary of State? Mr. Pugh has referred to S. 20, Government of India Act, which deals with the revenues of India and Cl. 2 (c) relates to the liabilities to which these revenues are subject. He refers to S. 29 which lays down the contracts which may be made by or on behalf of the Secretary of State. Clause 5 of that section provides how these contracts are to be made and who is competent to make them:

Provided that any contract for or relating to the manufacture, sale, purchase or supply of goods, or for or relating to affreightment or the carriage of goods or to insurance, may, subject to such rules and restrictions, as the Secretary of State in Council prescribes, be made and signed on behalf of the Secretary of State in Council by any person upon the permanent establishment of the Secretary of State in Council who is duly empowered by the Secretary of State in Council in this behalf. Contracts so made and signed shall be as valid and effectual as if made as prescribed by the foregoing provisions of this section.

Particulars of all contracts so made and signed shall be laid before the Secretary of State in Council in such manner and form and within such times as the Secretary of State in Council prescribes.

Now, it is plain that according to this section the contract to be valid must be in writing and must be signed by a person who has been specially empowered to sign it. That person must be upon the permanent establishment of the Secretary of State. Mr. Pugh observes that Waite was not on the permanent establishment nor was he specially empowered in that behalf. Any authority that he had to deal with munitions at all was derived from Peterson who delegated certain of his own powers to him. Moreover where the statute says that the contract to be valid must be in writing, verbal contracts, even if established, have no effect. Mr Pugh has referred to a number of cases in support of this, viz.: Shivabajan v. Secretary of State (4), Srinibas v. Kesho (5), Kinlock v. Secretary of State (6), Grey v. Charusila (7), Ashbury v. Rieke (8), Young v. Mayor of Leamington (9), Doya Narain v. Secretary of State (10).

Mr. Sircar contends that it is not the plaintiff firm's case that the Secretary of State has signed the contracts or that somebody else has signed it for him. The Secretary of State is liable because he is the person to be sued when the plaintiff wants to get his money out of Indian revenues. The plaintiff says that these were purchases by a servant of the Government of India which were in some cases paid for by the Government of India and for which in the present case the Government of India is liable. Here the Government of India had decided that it would buy goods in the open market like any tradesman. Mr. Sircar relies on S. 20 (2) (c), Government of India Act and S. 32 (1) and (3):

There shall be charged on the revenues of India alone, all expenses, debts and liabilities lawfully contracted and incurred on account of the Government of India.

Section 32 (1) says that the Secretary of State in Council may be sued and may sue as a body corporate and Cl. (3) provides that the property for the time being vested in His Majesty for the purposes of the Government of India shall be liable to the same judgments and executions as it would have been liable to in respect of liabilities lawfully incurred by the East India Company, if the Government of India Act and this Act had not been passed.

Mr. Sircar contends that though there is no contractual relationship between plaintiff and the Secretary of State, yet under S. 32 (1), the Secretary of State has to be sued as a body corporate and under Cl. (3) he is liable in the same way that the East India Company would have been liable. He has referred to Sarat Chandra Dass v. Secretary of State (11), Secretary of State v. Hari Bhanji (12) and Kishen Chand v. Secretary of State (13).

There can, I think, be no question that the Secretary of State can be sued as a body corporate as provided in S. 32 (1), Government of India Act. As was pointed out in Doya Narain Tewary v. Secretary of State (10):

A suit brought against the Secretary of State is not one against any person or any real body corporate but is one brought against a nominal defendant, such nominal defendant being put upon the record merely to enable the plaintiff to obtained the remedy secured to him by S. 65.

It is plain from S. 32 (3) that the property for the time being vested in His Majesty for the purpose of the Government of India shall be liable to the same judgments and executions as it would have been liable to in respect of liabilities lawfully incurred by the East India Company.

The position has been explained in the case of Peninsular and Oriental S. N. Co. v. Secretary of State (14), the head-note of which says:

The Secretary of State is liable for damages occasioned by the negligence of servants in the service of Government, if the negligence is such as would render an ordinary employer liable. The test really is whether the contract was a Sovereign act or was one which a private individual could have entered upon in his ordinary business pursuits. If it is the former, the Secretary tary of State is not liable, but if it is the latter he can be sued in the same way that the East India Company could have been sued for acts done in their capacity as traders and not as the Sovereign Power.

Where commandeering orders are concerned, I think the position is plain. Power was taken by Government under the Defence of India (Consolidation) Act, 1915, and under R. 11A (a) an officer specially authorized in this behalf is enabled by an order in writing to require the owner of any particular class of goods (these goods were specially notified by Government) to place them at the disposal of Government at such time and place as was specified in the order, making disobedience to the order punishable at law. Provision for payment of the price by reference to arbitration is also made. In this case, therefore, there can clearly be no ordinary commercial contract for sale and purchase, because one of the parties may be unwilling to surrender his goods and yet may be compelled under the commandeering order to do so. He has no option once the order has been made and issued. He is bound to place his goods at the disposal of Government when called upon to do so. The only right he has is that if he does not accept the price offered by Government he can have it settled by arbitration. The arbitrator's order is final. Plainly, therefore, a commandeering order is one which no one but Government can make, and being an act of the Sovereign Power, the Secretary of State evidently cannot be sued in respect of it.

It has, however, been argued by Mr. Sircar that the process of acquisition by Waite has been exactly the same whether it has been by delivery orders or by commandeering orders, and the contract in either case was a good contract, though the method of payment may be different. A sale is a good sale though no price may be fixed at the time of the purchase, when the arrangement is that the price will be subsequently settled by a particular agency: Valpy v. Gibson (15).

I do not think this argument is well founded. Waite had no authority to issue a commandeering order. That could only be done by Peterson, who as Controller was specially authorized in that behalf. When, therefore, Waite wrote "Make out commandeering order" and the like, he was really giving instructions to his office to make out the order in anticipation of Peterson's sanction. But until the order was signed by Peterson and served on the owner, it had no legal or binding effect and the owner might, if he had been so inclined, have disposed of the goods in any way he pleased. Ghaznavi says, it is true, that a person holding goods which came under the special class notified could not sell these goods without a license from the Government. That no doubt is so. But the embargo on this class of goods was withdrawn in December 1918, and it is idle to say now that after that date Ghaznavi could not have disposed of these goods in any manner that suited him.

A further question then arises whether contracts other than those specified in S. 29 (5), Government of India Act, can be held to be binding on the Secretary of State. In my judgment they cannot. In Young v. Mayor of Royal Leamington (9), where the statute provided that where the subject-matter of contract exceeds £50 in value, contracts must be under seal, and when the contract was not under seal it was held to be bad and unenforceable. Lord Bramwell said, at page 528:

The legislature has made provisions for the protection of rate-payers, share-holders, and others, who must act through the agency of a representative body by requiring the observance of certain solemnities and formalities which involve deliberation and reflection. That is the importance of the seal. It is idle to say there is no magic in a wafer. It continually happens that carelessness and indifference on the one side, and the greed of gain on the other, cause a disregard of these safeguards, and improvident engagements are entered into.

If these principles are applied to the present case it may be said that while there is no magic in a written contract, it is a safeguard which has been laid down by the statute for the protection of the public revenues. When, therefore, a statute lays down certain mandatory provisions in regard to the framing of contracts between the Secretary of State and a private individual, it is no answer to say that because the provisions were ignored on particular occasions and payments were made on contracts which were not in conformity with the statute, that should be taken as a precedent which will be binding upon the Secretary of State in every case. In my judgment contracts to be binding upon the Secretary of State, must be made in strict conformity with the provisions laid down in the statute. If they are not so made, they are not valid as against him.

I now proceed to consider the question of the sufficiency of the notice under S. 80, Civil P. C. with which the question of limitation is bound up. This section says :

No suit shall be instituted against the Secretary of State for India in Council . . . until the expiration of two months next after notice in writing has been, in the case of the Secretary of State in Council, delivered to, or left at the office of, a Secretary of the Local Government . . . stating the cause of action, the name, description and place of residence of the plaintiff and the relief which he claims.

In this case the notice was given to the Financial Secretary to the Government of Bengal on the 26th July. Mr. Pugh argues that if the alleged breach of contract took place, then, the notice is good. But if the plaintiff firm wishes to get out of limitation by saying they had not to deliver till called on to do so, then there was no cause of action of which they could give notice and the notice was bad.

Mr Sircar replies that there was no question of giving delivery till asked for and therefore, under S. 93, Contract Act, the plaintiff was not bound to deliver until such application was made. Further, under S. 46, Contract Act, plaintiffs had not to perform their engagements until after a reasonable time, and it is argued that the joint effect of these sections is to free the plaintiffs from liability to deliver at any time, reasonable or otherwise, until they were called upon to do so. It was for Waite to indicate when and where the delivery was to be made, and until he did so, the plaintiff firm had not to move, and limitation had not begun at all. The delay of seven months, therefore, could not be held to be unreasonable in view of the congestion which prevailed in all the Government depots. Further, Mr. Sircar has urged that the words "cause of action" as used in S. 80 should not be too strictly construed. He relies on Secretary of State v. Perumal Pillai (16), Jehangir v. Secretary of State (17), Jones v. Bird (18), Manindra Chandra Nandi v. Secretary of State (19). He points out that in the letter of 26th July the plaintiffs had stated their grounds of complaint and as the object of the section is merely to intimate to the Secretary of State the details of the complaint and to give him two months within which to make amends Perumal's case (16) is directly in point as the claim had arisen after the notice was given.

It is quite true, as was explained in Perumal's case (16), at p. 282, that the cause of action should not be taken in a narrow sense, the object of the section being merely to inform the defendant substantially of the ground for complaint. But it is, in my judgment, equally true to say that the section requires the cause of action to be stated with some precision. Now, what is the cause of action stated in the attorney's letter of the 26th July? In the third para, it is said no instructions have been given to our client for delivery of the goods, and lower down:

Unless our clients are given the requisite orders to deliver the materials, which Capt. S. C. Waite agreed on behalf of the Munitions Board to take over, they will have no course but to adopt legal proceedings.

The letter does not say the cause of action is a breach of the contract between the Board and the plaintiff firm. The breach is still in futuro, and depends upon the definite refusal of the Government to issue the delivery order. That being so, the cause of action does not appear to have arisen at the time of the notice and the notice must, therefore, be invalid. If on the other hand, the plaintiff's case that there was a stipulation that the goods were not to be delivered till called for is true, a term must be inferred from the contract or read into it, but there is in fact no such term. If such a term is to be inferred it must be a reasonable term, i.e., it must be within a reasonable time of the receipt of the last order of the 26th August 1918. It is plain from Keatinge's letter of 15th January 1919 that he regarded "all outstanding orders" placed with the plaintiff firm as finished. This was followed by Peterson's notification of the 2nd February stopping all further deliveries. The suit was not filed till June 1922. It was, therefore, plainly the duty of the plaintiff firm to show that there was a term in the contract by which delivery was not to be called for up to July 1919, that is to say, ten months after the contract. This, in my judgment, he has failed to do and Ghaznavi's statement that Waite promised to take delivery in July is falsified by the fact that the suggestion neither appears in his attorney's letter threatening the suit nor in the plaint itself. There is also the undoubted fact that Waite went on leave in January 1919 to Ghaznavi's knowledge, and that his services were dispensed with in February following. Ghaznavi was perfectly aware of that too, and if his claim had been well founded he must have pressed it as soon as he heard that Waite was no longer in a position to issue the delivery orders which Ghaznavi says he promised him the previous November.

In my judgment, the breach of alleged contract should be held to have occurred on 1st February 1919 when Peterson issued his circular letter and limitation began to run from then, and as the suit was not filed within three years from that date it is barred by limitation.

I therefore answer the issues as follows:

Issue 1.—First part, Yes, in so far as commandeering orders were concerned, Second part, No.

Issues 2, 3 and 4.—No.

Issues 5, 6, 7.—No.

Issues 8.—Yes, 15th January 1919 and 2nd February 1919.

Issues 9 and 10.—Yes.

Issue 11.—No evidence was led by the defendant. I answer this issue in the affirmative.

Issue 12.—No evidence was led by the defendant. I answer this issue in the negative.

Issue 13.—None.

The result, therefore, is that the suit will stand dismissed with costs on scale 2, including costs of the commission and reserved costs, if any.

Rankin, C J—I have had an opportunity of reading the judgment which is going to be delivered by Mr. Justice Buckland with which I agree

Buckland, J—Under Ch 7, R. 5 of the Rules of the Court, the three appeals, Nos. 377, 468 and 302 of 1927, have been referred to a Full Bench for the purposes of a final determination of the construction to be put upon Prov. 2, S. 276, Criminal P. C. So far as the facts of these cases relate to the manner in which the juries were empanelled, they are set out in the order of reference as follows:

In appeal No. 377, the accused were charged under S. 147 and under S. 325 read with S. 149, I. P. C. Ten persons were summoned to serve on the jury. Of these ten, six persons attended. Of these six, it was ascertained that one was serving in the office of a society of which the Public Prosecutor was the President. An objection being taken to this individual, the objection was sustained, and he was discharged. This left five persons who had been summoned. The learned Judge chose one man from among the bystanders in Court, added his name to those of the five persons summoned, and from these six he jury of five was chosen by lot.

In appeal No. 463, the accused was charged under S. 302, I. P. C. The number of persons summoned does not appear from the affidavits, but it is agreed that seven jurors were present, two of whom were European gentlemen. These two were discharged on the ground that they did not understand Bengali. Two persons were chosen from among the bystanders and added to the five who remained, thus making a jury of seven. It is said that in these circumstances there was no choosing by lot.

In appeal No. 302, the charges were laid under Ss. 304, 147 and 304 read with S. 149, I. P. C. Twelve persons had been summoned to serve on the jury. Seven of these attended, of whom one was excused. Out of the remaining six, five jurors were chosen by lot.

The questions which arise for determination in each case are: (1) Was the jury empanelled as required by law? (2) If not, must the convictions and sentences be set aside, and a new trial ordered?

The determination of the first of these two questions will depend in each case on the view taken of the proviso to be considered. Consideration of the second question only arises after the first has been determined

Stating the matter broadly, there are two opposite views, which have been submitted, of the effect of the proviso. One is that in the event of there being a deficiency of persons summoned a sufficient number of persons from among those present may, with the leave of the Court, be added to the number of persons summoned who have attended, and that a choice should then be made by lot from the composite body so formed

The other view is that the choice by lot referred to at the beginning of the section is confined to a choice by lot from among the persons summoned, and that when the deficiency appears, the number of jurors required may be chosen from such other persons as may be present, and the jury thereby completed without any further drawing of lots.

Whichever view is the correct one, it is subject to the right of the prisoner to object to a juror. The sections relating to such right do not directly affect the construction of the proviso, but they may be considered for the purpose of arriving at its correct meaning.

The view first stated is that which has been advanced on behalf of the appellants. The argument presented to us proceeds in the first instance from S. 326, which provides for summonses to be issued to the number of jurors required for the sessions, the number to be summoned not being less than double the number required for any trial.

Assuming a jury to consist of five at least ten persons must be summoned, and it is said that that figure is to be taken as the number of persons among whom lots are to be drawn for the purpose of choosing a jury. From this point it is argued that the words "deficiency of persons summoned" means deficiency of persons summoned for the purpose of making up the minimum number of ten among whom lots are to be drawn. This argument then leads to the conclusion that the word "jurors" in the proviso refers to potential jurors, or, as they are termed in the first part of the section, to "persons summoned to act as such."

It is not possible to find any logical reason for this indiscriminate and indeed, one might say, careless use of the word "jurors" within the compass of one section for the purpose of indicating different sets of persons. The argument, however has this support, so far as it is, a question of mere terminology, that Ss 327 and 323, and it may be others, refer to "jurors" when what is meant is persons directed to attend for service as jurors.

The argument also involves that the expression "chosen by lot" and the word "chosen" have been both employed to convey the same meaning, viz, a selection by ballot. Again, for this no logical justification can be found, and the two cannot be regarded as synonymous, unless there is no other possible construction to be placed upon them.

In the course of the argument, it was suggested that the ballot required by S. 326 (2) as to the persons to be summoned, and that required by S. 276, were intended to benefit the prisoner, by ensuring as far as possible an unbiased and impartial jury, chosen haphazard, and that this furnishes an additional reason for requiring that even when the proviso has to be invoked there shall nevertheless be a ballot. With this, in some measure, I agree, but inasmuch as the prisoner has the right of challenge conferred by S. 278, I should be disposed to think that the object of the several ballots was as much to ensure the fair and impartial incidence of the duty of service upon those who are liable to it.

The position when a successful objection to a juror has been made is dealt with by S. 279. In the first instance, the place of the juror is to be supplied by any other juror attending in obedience to a summons and chosen as S. 276 provides, that is by ballot. If no such juror is present, the place of the juror to be supplied shall be filled by any other person present whose name is on the jury list or whom the Court considers a proper person to serve on the jury, subject, of course, to a successful objection, as stated in the proviso to S. 279. Here the argument for the appellants has to concede that in such circumstances no ballot is possible.

In my opinion, the view which I have discussed is fallacious, and proceeds entirely from an erroneous conception as to the deficiency to which the proviso refers. In the course of argument, we were informed that it is the practice in District Courts to ascertain beforehand how many of the persons summoned to serve as jurors have attended and thus determine the "deficiency" to be supplied. If that is the case, in my judgment it is a practice which is not authorized by law and should be discontinued. No doubt, persons summoned as jurors who do not attend are liable to fine. But the stage at which it should be ascertained whether they have attended or not is not reached until their names are called out for the purpose of empanelling a jury.

The procedure to be followed in nominating a jury is laid down in Ch. 1, R. 54, of the G. C. Orders. If carefully observed, step by step, no difficulty will occur. It is to be presumed that the total number summoned is that required by S. 326 that is to say, at least ten, for a jury of five, and in the aggregate there may be more. This will depend upon the number required for the Sessions and stated in the letter to the District Magistrate. On the names being drawn from the box, one by one, each after another, and called aloud as each is drawn, it will become apparent who has not attended, and it is only when all the names have been so drawn and a number of persons insufficient for the purpose of constituting a jury have answered to their names, that the deficiency will become manifest. The deficiency will be the number by which the number of persons answering their names and empanelled falls short of the number of persons of which the jury should consist. It is then and not until then that, in my opinion, the proviso begins to operate, and on that point being reached, the Court has to exercise a discretion whether to allow persons to be chosen from among the bystanders in sufficient number to supply the deficiency, or whether to adjourn the case for a fresh jury to be summoned.

The circumstances in which such discretion should be exercised, and how, do not call for consideration in this case. It suffices to say that it must be exercised in such a way as to secure to the prisoner a fair and impartial trial.

I should like to draw attention to a recent alteration of the rule referred to, which provides that as the name of each juror is drawn, it shall be called aloud, and upon the juror appearing, the prisoner or person to be tried shall be asked if he objects to be tried by such juror. This furnishes the opportunity of challenging under S. 277, and if the procedure prescribed is followed, no difficulty will arise in compliance with the provisions of S. 279 (2), since all the names of persons summoned will have been placed in the box.

I have endeavoured to state my conclusions in a form which may be of practical utility, and I will now summarize them. The section provides, in the first instance, for a ballot among the persons summoned under S. 326, all of whom may or may not be present. When their names have been exhausted, if a jury has not yet been empanelled, the Court may, in its discretion, allow the number requisite to complete the jury to be chosen from among the bystanders, or may adjourn the case for a fresh jury to be summoned. As each name is drawn and called aloud, if the person summoned answers, or as each juror is chosen from among the bystanders, should that point have been reached and that course be permitted, the accused shall be asked if he objects to be tried by such juror. Should the objection be allowed, the Court should proceed as laid down in S. 279 (2), adopting the course prescribed according as there are or not persons left from among those summoned whose names have not been drawn.

It now only remains to give, with respect to the three appeals, the replies to the questions submitted to us, but before so doing I may state that it follows from the foregoing that Bholanath Hazra v. King-Emperor (1) and Roshan Ali v. King-Emperor (2), so far as they lay down a different principle, should not be followed.

As regards Appeal 377 : the answer to the first question is that the jury was not empanelled as required by law. In this case, therefore, the convictions and sentences will be set aside, and there must be a re-trial with a jury duly empanelled in the manner prescribed. The accused persons in this case will be on bail to the satisfaction of the District Magistrate.

As regards Appeal 468 : the jury was in effect empanelled as permitted by law from the five persons summoned and the two chosen from among the bystanders and the case, therefore, will be remanded to the Division Bench to dispose of it on such other points as may yet have to be determined. As regards Appeal 302, the jury was empanelled as required by law, and there will be the same order of remand in this case as in Appeal 468.

Cuming, J. — I agree and have nothing to add.

Ghose, J. — I agree in the judgment just now delivered by my learned brother Mr Justice Buckland.

Mukerji, J. — I agree in all that my learned brother Buckland, J., has said in his judgment, and desire to add a few words.

To put upon the Prov. 2, to S. 276, any of the interpretations contended for on behalf of the appellants would lead to an absurd position which could never have been intended. Suppose out of ten persons summoned to act as jurors, five, namely, S1 to S5, attend. According to one of these interpretations at least, one more, say P1, will have to be taken from the persons present in order that there may be a choosing of five by lot out of six ; according to another, at least five more say P1 to P5, will have to be so taken so that there may be an effective lottery with equal chances ; according to a third, the whole body of persons present, say P1 to Px, will have to be taken though on the face of it such a procedure would be impracticable. According to all the said interpretations, the word "chosen" in the proviso, means "chosen by lot." All of the two series S and P will, therefore, be in the ballot box. If Ss. 277 to 279 are now applied, suppose the drawing gives one of the S series as the first man, and he being objected to with success goes out. So long as the drawing does not give another of the S series, but of the P series only, all the latter will have to go out automatically and not have to serve, though never objected to, unless one or more of them are again selected from the general body under the last part of the first paragraph of Cl. (2), S. 279. Could such a result have been intended?

In my opinion, S. 276 with all its provisos is a general section, dealing with the general nature of the procedure, and the details of that procedure are given in Ss. 277 to 279. I am also of opinion that the words "with the leave of the Court" in the Prov. 2 to S. 276, give a discretion to the Court to proceed or not to proceed in this particular way, namely, allowing persons in Court to come in as jurors accordingly as it thinks fit: it is not difficult to imagine cases in which such a procedure will not be resorted to. I am further of opinion that the words the place of such juror shall be supplied by any other juror attending in obedience to a summons and chosen in manner provided in S. 276 in S. 279, Cl. (2), clearly point to S series only taking part in the ballot, and that the section cannot be worked if P series are to take part in it.

Mukanda Behari Mallik—for Appellants.

Sarat Chandra Basak and Hemendra Chandra Sen—for Respondents.

B. B. Ghose, J.—These two appeals are by the defendant. They arise out of two suits for ejectment brought by the plaintiff on the allegation that the plaintiff was a ryot with regard to two holdings. The father of the defendant was his under-ryot. The under-ryot having died in 1921, the defendant had no right to remain on the land as the interest of an under-ryot is not heritable under the law. The defendant, therefore, is in the position of a trespasser and is liable to be ejected.

The plea of the defendant was that his father was an occupancy-ryot and that the predecessor-in-interest of the plaintiff, namely, Jogendra Ghose, was a tenure-holder, and Jogendra having granted a permanent lease to the defendant's predecessors, he was estopped from asserting that the defendant's predecessors were under-ryots and so the plaintiff who has obtained the interest of Jogendra by purchase at a sale in execution of a decree is also estopped from asserting that defendant's father was an under-ryot. The Munsif declared the interest of the plaintiff as a purchaser of the interest of Jogendra but dismissed the claim for ejectment and for mesne profits. The Subordinate Judge reversed the decision of the Munsif and held that the plaintiff is a ryot and, therefore, the defendant's father was an under-ryot under him and after the death of the defendant's father defendant had no right to remain on the land. He further held, reversing the decision of the Munsif, that the fact that the defendant had paid rent to the superrior landlord on behalf of the plaintiff does not confer any title upon him. It is contended on behalf of the defendant by his learned vakil that the Subordinate Judge is in error in holding that the plaintiff was a ryot and that defendant's father was an under-ryot. He relies upon the fact that this tenancy has been in existence for a great number of years. It was said to be the holding of one Najib-ulla which appears from the maliki karcha of 1290, i. e., 1883. In 1291 this was described as a jote. A jote may mean the interest of an occupancy ryot or of a tenure-holder. This is not conclusive. Under the tenant Najibulla or his successor-in-interest Jogendra, one Mahima held the land as a pure cultivating tenant. Jogendra held the land in the name of his benamdar Jadav. Mahima's interest was sold in auction in execution of a rent-decree and it was purchased by Jogendra who let it out by accepting a kabuliyat from the defendant's father Gobinda. In that kabuliyat the interest of Jogendra was described as a ganti and it purports to have conferred upon Govinda a permanent lease. Under these circumstances there is no doubt that Jogendra would have been estopped from asserting his right as a ryot and to eject the defendant on the ground that his father was a mere under-ryot. The Subordinate Judge, however, has found that the interest of Jogendra was merely that of a ryot which was purchased in execution by the plaintiff and after his purchase the plaintiff had to get his name mutated in the sherista of the superior landlord on payment of an enhanced rent. The Subordinate Judge holds that Jogendra also had to pay enhanced rent, but the learned vakil for the appellant says that there is no ground for so holding. Assuming that it is so, still there is no doubt that the plaintiff had to pay an enhanced rent in order to have himself recognized by the superior landlord. If Jogendra's interest had been that of a tenure-holder, there would have been no necessity for this payment of enhanced rent for his recognition and this fact supports the finding of the Subordinate Judge that what the plaintiff purchased was the interest of a non-transferable occupancy-ryot.

With regard to the question of estoppel it is only necessary to point out that the plaintiff cannot be held to be bound by the estoppel of Jogendra, as after having purchased at an execution sale he obtained a new title from the landlord at an increased rent.

The next question is whether after the death of defendant's father, by payment of rent to the superior landlord on account of the disputed land on behalf of the plaintiff, the defendant has constituted himself a tenant. There is no allegation or finding that the plaintiff ever authorized the defendant to pay rent on his behalf. It is urged that this payment was made by the defendant with the knowledge of the plaintiff's gomasta and the plaintiff subsequently took advantage of that payment by paying only the balance of the rent due from himself to the superior landlord. It is urged that by this the plaintiff has precluded himself from suing the defendant in ejectment. This argument cannot be supported on any principle. If after the death of his father the defendant without any direction from the plaintiff pays rent to the superior landlord representing himself to do so on behalf of the plaintiff, that would not confer upon him any right if the plaintiff does not choose to accept him as a tenant.

As to the plaintiff's taking advantage of the payment the only thing that can be said in answer is that the plaintiff had no option left. The landlord had credited the amount paid by the defendant in his books. The only amount he demanded from the plaintiff was the balance. The plaintiff, of course, might have repaid the amount to the defendant as he was morally bound to do, as the Munsif has observed. But the Subordinate Judge found that the defendant's father was in arrears at the time of his death and, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to receive some money from the defendant on account of his father's debt. The fact that the gomasta of the plaintiff knew about the payment by the defendant also cannot support the defendant's case. The gomasta cannot, in the absence of evidence, be held to be authorized to settle tenants on the land of the plaintiff or to recognize any person as tenant and his mere knowledge that the defendant was paying rent to the superior landlord cannot be said to bind the plaintiff in any way so as to compel him to recognize the defendant as his tenant.

One last point was sought to be urged that after the death of the defendant's father, the plaintiff sued the defendant for rent, under protest, it is said, for a period after the death of the defendant's father. If the plaintiff had really sued the defendant for rent for any period after the death of the defendant's father, that would be a recognition of the defendant's right as tenant and, that being so, he would not be entitled to eject the defendant without taking proper steps under the Bengal Tenancy Act for terminating the tenancy. But it seems that that suit was brought for use and occupation and that would not constitute a recognition of the defendant's tenancy. This ground was not specifically taken in the grounds of appeal as the learned vakil for the respondent points out.

These two appeals, therefore, fail and must be dismissed with costs.

* Landlord and Tenant—General covenant to repair extends to newly erected buildings.

A general covenant to repair includes not merely buildings existing when the demise is made, but all those which may be erected during the term. C. C. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal against a judgment and decree passed and made by my learned brother Mr. Justice Page on the 25th February 1927 in an action by the plaintiff to recover possession of a block of buildings lying at the corner of Wellington Street and Dhurumtolla Street. The plaintiff based his cause of action for recovery of possession of the premises upon the breach of (1) a covenant to pay rent, and (2) a covenant to repair contained in the Indenture of lease dated 3rd August 1906. As regards the covenant to pay rent, it appears that, before the suit came on for hearing, the defendant who is the assignee of the original lessee had deposited in Court the amount of rent due by and from him to the lessor. Mr Justice Page came to the conclusion that in these circumstances the Court was entitled to exercise its powers under S. 114, T. P. Act and give the necessary relief to the tenant. On the question whether there had or had not been a breach of the covenant to repair Mr Justice Page came to the conclusion that, so far as the demised premises were concerned, there had been no breach of the covenant to repair but that, in respect of certain buildings which were erected after the date of the Indenture of lease and which buildings had been so constructed that they, in his opinion, formed part of the demised premises, there had been a breach of the covenant to repair, and accordingly he passed a decree in ejectment in favour of the lessor.

On appeal before us it has been contended that the additional buildings referred to in the judgment of Mr. Justice Page and which were subsequently erected on a part of the demised premises which was then vacant land, did not form part of the two storeyed house as it stood at the date of the Indenture of lease but were entirely separate buildings having no connexion with the original buildings and that, therefore, the covenant to repair did not extend to the new erections, and accordingly there had been no breach of the covenant to repair, and in the circumstances no decree for ejection should have been made in favour of the lessor.

Apart from what is contained in the said Indenture of lease Mr. Justice Page relied in support of his finding that the new erections had been and were made part of the original buildings, upon the evidence of the original lessee S. J. Cohen wherein he stated that the new buildings were joined on to the original buildings and made a portion of the same so that the buildings, i. e., the original buildings and the subsequent erections became thereafter one whole building. The expression "joined on to the old buildings" is somewhat misleading and it does not convey with any degree of precision what exactly became the state of things after the new buildings had been erected. In these circumstances, Sir Benode Mitter for the respondent and Mr. Sarkar for the appellant invited us to go down to the spot and see for ourselves the state of things and appreciate the evidence on record on the new buildings in such a manner that the new buildings became part of the old buildings, or whether the new buildings were separate by themselves having no sort of connexion whatsoever with the original buildings. Having regard to the evidence to which our attention was drawn and having regard to the difficulty which we experience in understanding and appreciating the evidence on record, we thought it proper to accept the invitation and to go down to the spot and see for ourselves the state of things for the purpose of understanding and appreciating the evidence.

Having seen the premises as they stand now, I have no difficulty in understanding the evidence of S. J. Cohen and I have no hesitation whatsoever in saying that on the evidence on record the new buildings were so constructed that in various portions thereof they were made part of the original buildings and in other portions they were so constructed that they could be made part of the original buildings at a moment's notice. The beams supporting the roof of the new one-storeyed building had been introduced into the walls of the original building and the roof of the new buildings is used as a terrace by the occupants of the first floor of the original building. In these circumstances it is difficult to resist the conclusion that the new buildings were so constructed as to form part of the original buildings and that they have been treated ever since as parts of the original buildings. Therefore, on the question of fact bearing on this issue, I am in entire agreement with Mr. Justice Page in holding that the new buildings could not be treated as separate by themselves but were, in fact and in truth, made part of the original buildings.

Now the question arises whether the covenant to repair contained in the Indenture of lease extended to such new erections. It has already been stated above that Mr. Justice Page did not find that there could be any reasonable complaint on account of the breach of the covenant to repair so far as the original buildings were concerned. The only question that arises, therefore, is whether the covenant to repair extended to such new erections. It is unnecessary, in my opinion, to go through the cases on the subject from 1683 downwards. The cases are all collected in a very concise form on pp. 325 and 326 of Vol. 31 of the English and Empire Digest and it would be sufficient for our purpose if we refer for the enunciation of the law on the subject to the last case bearing on it, namely, the case of Field v. Curnick (1). In that case it appears that by a lease dated 1837 the lessors demised to the lessee for 99 years a piece of ground together with the messuages or tenements and all other erections and buildings which at any time thereafter during the said term should be built on the same piece of ground or any part thereof and the lessee covenanted to build on the lands demised two good and substantial brick messuages or tenements, and to repair and keep repaired "the said premises." The lessee built six houses as to which it was impossible to say which two were actually completed first. In that state of things the learned Judge came to the conclusion on the evidence on record that the six houses were built simultaneously and finished at the same time. He further held that the covenant to repair extended not only to the two houses which the lessee covenanted to build but to all the six houses. Mr. Justice Sankey then observed as follows :

In my view, the law is as follows : If a lessor demises a house and there is an express covenant to repair, the lessee is of course bound by it. If, on the other hand, the lessor demises a piece of land and there is an express covenant by the lessee to repair any houses subsequently erected thereon, equally the lessee is bound by it. Further a general covenant to repair includes not merely buildings existing when the demise is made, but all those which may be erected during the term: see Cornish v. Cleife (2) and Foa on Landlord and Tenant, 6th Edition, p. 248. If, however, the covenant to repair is only one to keep in repair the demised premises, it applies to those existing at the date of the lease only unless the new buildings are made part of the old ones.

Now in this case the Indenture of lease contained the following proviso:

And at all times during the said term of years keep the said premises in good and substantial repair and the same in good and substantial repair deliver up to the lessor his heirs or assigns at the expiration or sooner determination of the said term.

Further:

And it is hereby agreed and declared by and between the parties hereto notwithstanding anything thereinbefore contained that the said lessee shall be at liberty to make all necessary additions and alterations to the demised premises to improve the buildings with the written consent of the lessor at his own cost during the continuance of the said term and all such changes, additions, fittings and fixtures so made shall become and be considered the property of the said lessor and the lessee shall have no right to remove the same either before or after the expiration of this lease.

Having regard to the terms of the Indenture of lease in the present case, there is no doubt that the covenant to repair is in very general terms, and it would in my opinion extend to the subsequently erected buildings. But, even if it be held that the covenant to repair does not extend to the subsequently erected buildings, in this case there could not be much doubt on the evidence that the new buildings were, in fact, additions to and had become part of the two-storeyed buildings which were originally demised and that, therefore, the covenant to repair would extend to the subsequently erected buildings. It follows, therefore, that the finding of Mr. Justice Page on the evidence on record that the covenant to repair extended to the newly erected buildings is one that cannot be seriously quarrelled with and that the appeal so far as it relates to that point must fail.

A small point has been taken that there is internal evidence in the Indenture of lease that the covenant to repair is restricted to what is described as the demised buildings, that is, the original buildings as they stood at the time of the grant of the lease. The argument is as follows: It is said that the landlord is under no obligation to restore any portion of the subsequently erected buildings if and when they are destroyed by reason of the causes specified in the Indenture of lease, whereas if any portion of the original building is destroyed by any of the causes the landlord is under an obligation to repair. In the second place it is stated that no additional rent was payable by reason of the erection of the subsequently erected buildings. So far as the last point is concerned, it may be stated that the lessee was under no obligation to erect new buildings. But if he did erect additional buildings with the consent of the lessor, they were to be considered the property of the lessor and the lessee would have no right to remove the same before or after the expiration of the lease. As Mr. Justice Page points out, the special provisions introduced into the lease with respect to the additions and alterations were inserted for two reasons, first, in order to get out of the provisions of S. 108, Transfer of Property Act, and, secondly, in order that it should not be open to the defendant in the event of some part of the additional premises, that he might erect, being destroyed in the manner set out in the lease to escape proportionate payment of rent so long as the additional structures were not rebuilt or repaired. I think, therefore, that the appellant cannot derive any comfort whatsoever from the provisions in the lease last referred to.

There is still a further small point to be noticed. It is stated that at the time when the lease was executed a sum of Rs. 2,500 was deposited with the lessor for the due fulfilment of the terms of the lease. The lease having now come to an end, the appellant urges that he should be given credit for this sum in calculating the amount ultimately payable to the lessor. Sir Benode Mitter on behalf of the respondent states that there has been no question at any time that the appellant is entitled to the credit of the said sum and he is willing that in the accounts when they are taken credit should be given to the appellant for the said sum of Rs. 2,500.

The result, therefore, is that the appeal fails on all the points which the learned counsel for the appellant has taken and it must stand dismissed with costs subject to credit being given to the defendant for Rs. 2,500 as stated above.

Buckland, J.—I agree. I only desire to add a few words with regard to the principal question of fact which has been argued on this appeal; that is, as to whether or not the state of the premises is such that the general covenant to repair applies to the additional premises. The evidence on that point has been quoted in extenso by the learned Judge in his judgment. What has to be proved is expressed in the passage which my learned brother has referred to in the judgment of Mr. Justice Sankey in the case of Field v. Curnick (1). It is necessary to establish that the new buildings are made part of the old ones.

The evidence has not been read to us; but we have been informed by learned counsel for the appellant that the passages quoted in the judgment of Mr. Justice Page are all the evidence on the point and he has also informed us that no evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiff on this point and that the answers on which the plaintiff relied were elicited in the cross-examination of the witness for the defendant. On two occasions, this witness, S. J. Cohen, was asked whether or not the new rooms were made part of the premises of the two-storeyed building and to each question his answer was that they were joined. He did not accept the questions in the form in which they were put and he expressed his answer in different words. In consequence, I felt considerable difficulty in knowing what the witness meant by using the word "joined." A horse is joined to a cart, but nobody suggests that the horse becomes a part of the cart. The word "joined" is not necessarily, therefore, conclusive on the point and I was very glad to welcome the invitation of learned counsel on both sides that we should go and see the buildings for ourselves. We have done so and, having seen the buildings, what I have observed with my own eyes has enabled me to understand the witness's evidence. I am satisfied that when the witness Cohen used the word "joined," he referred to conditions and a state of facts which brings the matter within the passage in the judgment of Mr. Justice Sankey to which I have referred. The view which I have had of the premises has enabled me to understand what the witness meant and his evidence, therefore, in my judgment, supports the finding beyond all question. I concur in the order to be made in this appeal.

Jadu Nath Kanjilal and Nripendra Chandra Das for Purna Chandra Chandra —for Appellants.

Panchanon Ghose and Radhika Rangan Guha for Jatis Chandra Guha—for Respondents.

Mukerji, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit instituted by two persons as plaintiffs for recovery of khas possession of some lands by evicting the principal defendant and for mesne profits.

The case as laid in the plaint was that the two plaintiffs acquired jamai right to the plaint lands on taking settlement thereof from the owners, that one Panchu Gope and one Bhupati Ghose used to hold the lands as korfa tenants under the said owners, that the said Panchu Gope and Bhupati Ghose mortgaged their rights to the principal defendant who sued upon the mortgage, and in execution of the decree which he obtained, purchased the same. The plaintiffs alleged that the principal defendant acquired no title by his purchase and was accordingly liable to be evicted. It is not necessary to refer to the defence for the purposes of this appeal.

The Munsif decreed the suit in part with proportionate costs. He gave the plaintiffs a decree directing that they do get khas possession of the plaint lands by evicting the principal defendant therefrom and also awarding them certain amount as mesne profits.

The principal defendant, therefore, preferred an appeal. The Subordinate Judge who dealt with the appeal allowed it, set aside the decree of the trial Court and dismissed the suit with costs of both the Courts. He observed, however, thus, at the conclusion of his judgment :

The decision of this suit would not operate as res judicata in any subsequent suit brought by plaintiffs for the same relief.

The plaintiffs have then preferred this appeal. A point has been raised as to the competency of this appeal it being urged that in view of the remarks of the learned Subordinate Judge quoted above, he has decided nothing and his decision does not amount to a decree within the meaning of S. 2, sub-S. (2) of the Code. This objection is not without substance, though perhaps it is also possible to take the view that the decision on the face of it amounts to a decree, and that the remarks to which reference has been made are obiter. It is unnecessary, however, to pursue this matter any further as it is always open to us to treat the memorandum of appeal as a revision petition, and we think we should be prepared to do so in the present case.

The Subordinate Judge has found that though in the plaint the two plaintiffs alleged that they had obtained settlement from the owners by registered patta or pattas (the word as used in Bengali being capable of either interpretation), in point of fact, of the three plots which the suit lands consist of, plaintiff 1 alone obtained settlement of plots Nos. 1 and 2 and plaintiff 2 alone obtained settlement of plot No. 3, the settlements being under two separate pattas, and one plaintiff having nothing to do with the other. On this finding he has held that plaintiff 1 is not entitled to get any decree for possession in plot No. 3 and plaintiff 2 is not entitled to get any decree for plots Nos. 1 and 2 and that, therefore, the joint decree in favour of the two plaintiffs for khas possession as well as for mesne profits for the three plots taken together is wrong and cannot be upheld. This view is entirely correct and can hardly be challenged.

But then the Subordinate Judge proceeded to dismiss the suit on the ground that the suit was not maintainable as there was misjoinder of parties and cause of action. He took the view that the misjoinder has affected the merits of the case, but all that he has said in support of this view is that a wrong decree was passed by the trial Court.

Learned advocate for the appellants says in the first place that in view of O. 1, R. 13 and O. 2, R. 7 the objection as to misjoinder not having been taken in the trial Court should not have been entertained at the appellate stage. This contention in my opinion should be overruled as the suit as framed was not bad for misjoinder: the plaintiffs themselves are to blame for not having disclosed the details of their respective titles in the plaint.

It is next urged on behalf of the appellants that the merits of the case or the jurisdiction of the Court have not been affected and so in view of S. 99 of the Code, the trial Court's decision should not have been reversed. But before this question is considered it is necessary to see whether in fact, there has been any misjoinder. On this question it is practically conceded on behalf of the respondent that taking O. 1, R. 1 and O. 2, R. 3 together and applying the same to the facts of the present case, as disclosed in the evidence, the suit is maintainable. The words of these rules are very wide. Their scope and the authorities bearing upon the same have been dealt with by this Court in Miscellaneous Appeal No. 231 of 1926, decided on 31st March 1927, the judgment of which case, I understand, is about to be reported. I shall quote only two passages from two of the more recent English decisions bearing upon this question as these rules are drawn upon the lines of the English Supreme Court Rules. In Markt v. Knight Steamship Co (1), Fletcher Moulton, L. J., observed thus :

Subject to the control of the Court, persons can unite as plaintiffs though seeking individual reliefs in cases where the investigation would to a great extent be identical in each individual case. The policy of the rule is to avoid needless expense where it can be done without injustice to anyone. And it carries out its object.

The Court of Appeal (Lord Sterndale, M. R., Warrington, L. J. and Scrutton,

(1) [1910] 2 K. B. 1021=79 L. J. K. B. 939
11 Asp. M. C. 460=108 L. T. 369.

L. J.) in Payne v British Time Recorder Co (2) have said :

Broadly speaking, where claims by or against different parties involve or may involve a common question of law or fact bearing sufficient importance in proportion to the rest of the action to render it desirable that the whole of the matters should be disposed of at the same time the Court will allow the joinder of plaintiffs or defendants, subject to its discretion as to how the action should be tried.

The result then is that the decree of the learned Subordinate Judge cannot be allowed to stand. It is accordingly set aside and the case will now go back to the lower appellate Court so that the appeal before that Court may now be dealt with on the merits and disposed of in accordance with law.

Costs of this appeal will abide the result.

Mitter, J.—This Rule was issued on the opposite party to show cause why the order of the Subordinate Judge of Pabna, dated the 30th July 1926, refusing to entertain the claim of the petitioners under O. 21, R. 58, Civil P. C., should not be set aside. The facts which have given rise to this Rule are :

That Rai Bahadur Dinanath Biswas, who is the opposite party to the Rule, is the 8-annas owner of certain mehals and he created a patni tenure in respect of 9-annas share of his interest, treating the 8-annas as 16-annas, in favour of the Sanyals; that on the 22nd of Falgoun, 1317 B S, the Sanyals sold the patni tenure by registered deeds of sale to the petitioners before this Court; that notwithstanding notice of purchase of patni by the petitioners, the zamindar brought a suit for rent in respect of the said patni against the Sanyals, who had parted with their interest in the patni at the date of the said suit and obtained a decree for arrears of rent on the 7th July 1925; that the decree-holder zamindar made three applications for execution, the last of which was on the 1st May 1926; that in this last application, the decree-holder, opposite party, instead of applying for attachment and sale of the patni tenure, under Ch. 14, Bengal Tenancy Act, applied for attachment and sale of only one-fourth share of the said tenure; that the said one-fourth share of the tenure was attached in pursuance of the application of the decree-holder and the petitioners preferred a claim to the attachment of the said share of the patni under O. 21, R. 58, Civil P. C., before the Subordinate Judge of Pabna.

The learned Subordinate Judge rejected the claim holding that the claim was not maintainable by reason of the provisions of S. 170, Bengal Tenancy Act. It may be mentioned here that the Subordinate Judge arrived at this conclusion 'not without great hesitation. In support of this Rule, the learned advocate for the petitioners has argued that the decision of the Subordinate Judge is wrong and that he has put a wrong interpretation under S. 170, Bengal Tenancy Act, in holding that that section applies not merely when a tenure or holding is attached in execution of a decree for arrears due thereon, but also when a portion of a tenure is attached in execution of a decree for arrears of the whole tenure. It seems to us that this contention is right. S. 170, Bengal Tenancy Act, runs as follows:

Section 278 to 283 (O. 21, Rr. 53—63) (both inclusive) of the Civil Procedure Code shall not apply to a tenure or holding attached in execution of the decrees for arrears due thereon.

The words "tenure" or holding mean the whole of the tenure or holding and not part of the tenure or holding. The intention of the legislature seems to be that in order to attract the operation of S. 170, Cl. (1), not only should the decree be for arrears of rent of the tenure, but that it should be executed as a rent decree, i.e., by the attachment and sale of the entire tenure. It is true that the word "tenure" includes a portion of the tenure, but, in order to understand the meaning of the section, the general scope of the chapter in which it occurs must be taken into consideration. S. 158 B (1), which is the first section of Ch. 14, Bengal Tenancy Act, says:

Where a tenure or holding is sold in execution of a decree for arrears of rent due in respect thereof (omitting immaterial portions) the tenure of holding shall, subject to the provisions of S. 22, pass to the purchaser, if, such decree was obtained by (i) a sole landlord or (ii) the entire body of landlords, or (iii) one or more co-sharer landlords who has, or have, sued for the rent due to all the co-sharers in respect of the entire tenure or holding and made all the remaining co-sharers parties defendant to the suit.

In other words, the scheme of the chapter is that if a decree is a decree for rent, in the true sense of the term, then the entire tenure will pass in execution of such decree. Ss. 160 and 161 deal with the encumbrances which a purchaser of the entire tenure cannot avoid except under certain conditions. S. 162 says:

When a decree has been passed for an arrear of rent due for a tenure or holding, and the decree-holder applies under S. 235 [O. 21, R. 11 2] Civil P. C., for the attachment and sale of the tenure or holding in execution of the decree, he shall produce a statement showing the pargana, estate and village in which the land comprised in the tenure or holding is situate, the yearly rent payable for the same and the total amount recoverable under the decree.

This section also shows that attachment and sale of the entire holding was contemplated in execution of a decree for rent. It does not appear from any of the provisions of the chapter that a portion of the holding could be sold in execution of a decree for rent. We think, therefore, the contention of the petitioners should prevail. The point raised, however, is not covered by authority. It should seem, however, that there are observations in the case of Chandra Sekhar Patra v. Rani Manjhee (1) which would indirectly lend support to the view we take. There the question arose that, where a rent decree had been obtained and the defaulting tenure was attached, whether the provisions of S. 170 could apply? The learned Judges held that S. 170 applied and made the following observations which are pertinent to the present question:

The lower Court has held that, as a matter of fact, he had attached the tenure in respect of which the arrears had been decreed. Some question has been raised before us to the effect that what was attached was not the tenure, but interest of the judgment-debtor in the land. Looking, however, at the terms of the application, we are not prepared to say that the attachment was not of the tenure itself.

From these observations one can infer that if it could be shown in that case that the interest of the judgment-debtor in the tenure and not the tenure was attached, the Court would have answered the question in the negative and would have held that S. 170 had no application to such a case. Whether I am right in drawing this inference or not from those observations, for the considerations to which I have referred as to the scope of Ch. 14, I think the Subordinate Judge's view is wrong.

Although S. 170, Bengal Tenancy Act, does not bar the entertainment of the claim in the present case, O. 21, R. 58, Civil P. C., cannot govern the present case and the petitioners are not competent to perfer an objection to the attachment under the provisions of the said Rule. The petitioners, as I shall show presently, are representatives of the judgment-debtors within the meaning of S. 47, Civil P. C., and objections to attachment raised by a party to the suit in which the decree under execution was passed or by his representative fall within the scope of S. 47. Objections to attachment raised by a third party come under O. 21, R. 58.

The tenure in question is admittedly a patni tenure. By S. 3 of the Patni Regulation (8 of 1819) the tenure is capable of being transferred by sale, gift or otherwise, at the discretion of the holder, as well as answerable for his personal debts, and subject to the process of the Courts of Judicature in the same manner as other real property.

By S. 5 of the regulation, the transfer, however, is subject to the payment of fee and security to the landlord, and until the conditions mentioned in the said section are fulfilled, the landlord has a right to refuse to register, and otherwise to give effect to such alienations, by discharging the party transferring his interest from personal responsibility, and by accepting engagements of the transferee.

It is open to the transferee to seek his remedy in the civil Court to compel the zamindar to give effect to the transfer if the security tendered is not accepted by the landlord. But until the registration of his name has been effected the transfer does not affect the zamindar's right and, in spite of the transfer, the landlord may ignore the transferee and may continue to hold the recorded tenant responsible for the rent and other obligations imposed upon the tenure. As has been pointed out by Sir Comer Petheram, C. J., in Joykrishna Mukhopadhyaya v. Sarfannessa (2) that until the fee (as required by S. 5) has been paid, the zamindar shall not be bound to register the transfer and further than that, until the transfer has been registered he shall not be bound to recognize the transfer in any way; that is to say, until his demand has been satisfied and the registration has been effected, the old tenant remains his tenant.

Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in the case of Luckhinarrain Mitter v. Khetto Pal Singh Roy (3) laid down that until the assignment has been registered or the assignee has been accepted by the patnidar as his tenant, the assignor is not discharged from liability and such liability may be enforced by the sale of the darpatni in execution of a decree against him for the rent.

In the present case the petitioners, who have purchased the judgmentdebtor's interest prior to the decree for rent obtained by the landlord are bound by that decree and as such are representatives of the judgment-debtors within the meaning of S. 47, Civil P. C. This view is in consonance with the view taken by this Court in the case of Surendra Narain Singh v. Gopi Sundari Dasi (3). The petitioners, therefore, being representatives of the judgment-debtors, can raise objections to the attachment under S. 47 of the Code. They cannot, as we have already stated, raise objections to the attachment under O. 21, R. 58, as they cannot be said to claim the property on their own account as a third party (not being a party to the suit or his representatives) could raise. It has been suggested to us by the learned advocate for the petitioners that their application before the lower Court might be treated as one under S. 47 of the Code and dealt with as such, but we are not prepared to do that, as the objections under S. 47 might not stand on the same footing as objections to the claim under O. 21, R. 58. The former class of objection may cover other and different grounds. We, therefore, discharge the present Rule, and in doing so we observe that it will be open to the petitioners, if so advised, to raise objection to the attachment in question under S. 47, Civil P. C.

In the circumstances of the present case each party will bear his own costs.

This judgment will govern Rule No. 953 of 1926.

Let the records be sent down at once.

Judgment.—It appears from an examination of the record that the order complained of was made without the first party being required to adduce evidence in support of their claim. The second party was called upon to show cause and they were required to adduce evidence in support of their denial of the right claimed by the first party. No doubt the second party did not appear to give evidence. But that did not get rid of the fact that the order complained of was made without the first party being called upon to give evidence to prove their claim.

In this view of the matter the order cannot stand and must be set aside and the rule is accordingly made absolute.

(a) Criminal P.C., Ss. 528-A and 29-A—Claim to be tried as a European British subject must be made before trial.

The claim to be tried as a European British subject under S. 29-A, Criminal P.C., must be made before the inquiry or trial actually begins so far as a case which falls within S. 528-A, Criminal P.C., is concerned. Not having made this claim when a person is first brought before the Magistrate for the purpose of trial or inquiry, it is not open to revive or make it at any subsequent stage.

Cuming, J.—The facts of the case out of which this rule arises are briefly as follows: On 18th October the petitioner in this rule obtained a warrant against the opposite party under S. 406, I. P. C., in the Court of the Police Magistrate at Alipur. On 9th November the case was made over by the Police Magistrate, Mr. Mahmood Ali, to Mr. S. C. Gupta for disposal. Mr. S. C. Gupta is a Magistrate exercising the powers of a Magistrate of the second class. Mr. Gupta began the trial on 9th November. When he examined one prosecution witness and adjourned the case till the 10th, when three more prosecution witnesses were examined. The trial proceeded also on 22nd November, when the accused was questioned and the charge was framed. The learned Magistrate then asked the accused if he claimed trial as a European British subject. The learned Magistrate was apparently under the impression that he was obliged to ask an accused, who apparently was a European British subject, whether he claimed to be tried as such. I may point out here that such a procedure is no longer necessary, so far as a case which comes within Ch. 44-A, Criminal P.C., is concerned. The accused apparently then stated that he did not desire to be so tried. His counsel then filed a petition claiming to be tried as a European British subject. Apparently he subsequently waived this claim and stated that he desired to cross-examine the complainant next day, and his client would waive his right to be dealt with as a European British subject. The case was then continued on 24th November, when more witnesses were examined and cross-examined, and the case was continued on 25th and 27th November and 4th and 21st December. On 21st December the accused once more claimed the right to be dealt with as a European British subject. The learned Magistrate holding that he had already been asked whether he claimed this right and had waived this right, rejected the application.

The accused then asked for time to move the District Magistrate or the appellate Court for a decision on the point. This, however, was refused and the case was continued. The accused then seems to have moved the Additional District Magistrate for a transfer of the case to the file of a 1st Class Magistrate, the contention of the accused being that as a European British subject under S. 29-A, Criminal P.C., he was entitled to be tried by a Magistrate of the 1st Class. The complainant, opposite party, contended before Mr. Blair, the Additional District Magistrate, that as the accused had waived his right to be so tried he could not now re-assert it. Mr. Blair, however, held that the right might be exercised by the accused any time up to the time when the Court was going to pass judgment in the case. He further held that it was open to him to revive his claim even though he specifically abandoned it. In this view of the law he withdrew the case from the file of Mr. S. C. Gupta and made it over to Mr. Alfred Bose, a Magistrate exercising first class powers.

The complainant has moved this Court, and she contends first of all that the claim to be dealt with as a European British subject, in other words, in this particular case, that the case should be heard by a 1st Class Magistrate, must be made before the trial actually began; and secondly she contends that once the accused has waived his right to be dealt with as a European British subject or, in other words, to have his case tried by a Magistrate of first class powers, he cannot revive his right.

The rule has been granted on four grounds, first that the learned Additional District Magistrate is wrong in holding that the claim to be tried as a European British subject, in a case contemplated by Ss 29-A, 528-A and 528-B, Criminal P. C., could be made at any time before judgment is delivered; secondly, that the learned Additional District Magistrate acted without jurisdiction in using the provisions of S 528, Criminal P. C., for the purpose of getting over an order which under the Code he could not do before the final orders in the case were passed; thirdly, that the learned Additional District Magistrate should have held that a claim to be tried as a European British subject, under Ss 29-A, 528-A and 528-B, Criminal P. C., had to be made at the very beginning of the trial, and if the claim so made was disallowed by the trial Court the remedy against the order disallowing the claim lay before the Court which would hear the appeal after a conviction or other order in the said case had been passed; and lastly, that the accused having once waived his right, the learned Additional District Magistrate should have held that the accused having once waived his right could not re-assert it in a later stage of the same case.

The decision of this rule turns upon the interpretation to be put upon Ss 528-A and 528-B, Criminal P. C. These sections are new, and hitherto have not formed the subject matter of judicial interpretation. Hence the question may be considered as one of more or less of first impression. S 29-A provides that no Magistrate of the second or third class shall inquire into or try any offence which is punishable otherwise than with fine not exceeding fifty rupees where the accused is a European British subject who claims to be tried as such.

The point is, as I have already said, when that claim is to be made. S. 528-A provides that where, in any case to which the provisions of Ch. 33 do not apply, any person claims to be dealt with as a European or Indian British subject, or where any person claims to be dealt with as a European (other than a European British subject) or an American, he shall state the grounds of such claim to the Magistrate before whom he is brought for the purpose of the inquiry or trial and such Magistrate shall inquire into the truth of such statement,

Mr Swinhoe, who has argued this case on behalf of the petitioner, has contended that these words make it quite clear that the accused must exercise his option to claim the privilege under S 29-A, Criminal P. C. before the trial actually commenced. Mr. Sen, who has appeared for the opposite party, on the other hand contends, looking at the analogy of S. 451-A, that the accused may apply at any time before the judgment is pronounced by the Magistrate. He points out that under the old Code, under S. 451-A, privilege might be claimed in a summons case at any time before the accused was heard in defence or in a warrant case before he entered on his defence, and the learned counsel's argument is that, as no such limitations are put down in the present S. 528-A, the legislature intended that the privilege might be claimed at any time before the judgment is pronounced.

Apart from the manifest inconvenience which must follow, if Mr. Sen's contention is correct, I think it is quite clear, reading the sections as we have them, that the legislature intended that the claim should be made before the trial or inquiry actually commenced. The words used are:

He shall state the grounds of such claim to the Magistrate before whom he is brought for the purpose of the inquiry or trial.

I understand these words to mean that he should make his claim as soon as he is brought before the Magistrate for the inquiry or trial, that is to say, before the inquiry or trial is commenced. Mr. Sen argues from S. 528-B, that the claim may be made at any time during the trial, because we find in that section the following expression :

If in any such case a European or Indian British subject or a European (other than a European British subject) or an American does not claim to be dealt with as such by the Magistrate before whom he is tried or by whom he is committed, and Mr. Sen argues from that that the claim may be made at any time during the trial before the Magistrate. I do not think that these words really support Mr. Sen's contention. I am inclined to think, reading the section as a whole, that these words refer to the case of a person who has been tried or whose case has been inquired into, but who has not claimed the privilege S. 528-B deals, I think, with the case of a person whose case has reached either the appellate stage or the trial in the Court to which he has been committed.

I do not think that any useful purpose will be served by considering the sections as they stood in the various Acts at various times. The sections are, I think, by themselves reasonably clear. There is no doubt that the claim must be made before the inquiry or trial actually begins so far as a case which falls within Ch. 44-A, is concerned.

That being so, it is unnecessary for us to determine whether the accused, having once waived his right to so claim, can revive that claim and be ordered to be tried as a European British subject. In the present case, not having made his claim when he was first brought before the Magistrate for the purpose of trial or inquiry, it was not open to revive or make it at any subsequent stage. In this case admittedly he made no claim at that stage.

The rule is, therefore, made absolute. The order of the learned Additional District Magistrate is set aside, and the case will be re-transferred to the file of Mr. S. C. Gupta to be continued from that point where the learned Magistrate left off the trial of the case, and the case disposed of without any further delay.

Graham, J.—I agree with my learned brother. One of the points for decision is as to the stage when the claim to be dealt with as a European British subject should be made. The learned counsel on behalf of the opposite party argued that that claim could be made at any time up to the delivery of judgment, and in support of his argument referred to the previous history of the Criminal Procedure Code and to certain authorities.

It appears to me that, unless the sections of the Code as it now stands are held to be obscure, we should not be justified in referring to the previous legislation. In my opinion on a proper construction of the sections of the Code, as it now stands, and in particular Ss. 528-A, and 528-B, it seems to be clear that the intention is that the claim shall be made at the commencement of the inquiry or trial as the case may be, and that if it is not then made, it cannot be asserted at any subsequent stage. The question of status involves the mode or venue of trial, and it is in accordance with the fitness of things that the claim should be made at the outset.

The authorities to which reference has been made relate to the former Code and in particular to S. 451, of the old Criminal P. C. which has now been repealed. They do not, therefore, give us any assistance.

In my judgment there was a failure in this case to make the claim at the time contemplated by the Code, possibly due to the fact that the provisions of the new Code on the subject were not at the time appreciated.

I concur in the order which my learned brother proposes to make, and agree that the rule should be made absolute.

Judgment—On 23rd August 1910 the predecessor-in-title of the plaintiffs let the premises in suit, now known as No 7-2, Halliday Street, Central Avenue, Calcutta, to the predecessor of defendants 1 and 2 for a term of 61 years. On 7th May 1923 defendants 1 and 3 mortgaged the said lease by way of sub-demise to defendant 3. On 20th August 1923 the plaintiff through his solicitors informed the defendants that he regarded the lease of 23rd August 1910 as having been determined by reason of the execution of the mortgage of 7th May 1923, which he alleged operated as a breach of the sixth covenant in the lease to be performed by the lessees. On 30th June 1925 defendants 1 and 2 became insolvent, and subsequently, pursuant to an order of Court, the official assignee in the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Sind was added as a party defendant.

Two defences have been raised by defendants, one involving an issue of fact, the other an issue of law. The issue of fact is whether by the acceptance of rent, after the plaintiffs had become aware of the mortgage, the forfeiture (if any) was waived. The issue of law is whether, having regard to the terms of the lease and the mortgage, and in particular the fifth and sixth covenants in the lease and Cl. 3 of the mortgage, a forfeiture of the lease took place.

5th. That the said lessee shall be at liberty or shall have the full power and authority without having recourse to previously securing to that effect the consent of the said lessor, written or verbal, to underlet the said demised land and the buildings, structures, sheds, godowns, stables or any portion thereof to be so erected and built by them as aforesaid.

6th. The said lessees shall have no power, save amongst themselves as hereafter mentioned to assign transfer or in any way to alienate their right, title and interest in the demised land and the buildings so to be erected by them thereon as aforesaid created by virtue of these presents.

Clause 3 of the mortgage runs as follows:

3. In further pursuance of the said agreement and for the consideration aforesaid the mortgagors do hereby demise and sub-let unto the mortgagee all the hereditaments and premises comprised in and demised by the said lease and more fully described in Sch. A hereunder written (which is valued at Rs. 10,000) and covenant to hold the same unto the mortgagee for the unexpired residue of the term of 61 years granted by the said lease subject to the proviso that this sub-lease shall terminate forthwith as and when the amount of money advanced by the mortgagee shall be repaid with interest herebefore mentioned and all costs as between attorney and clients and all dues for the time being as herebefore and hereinafter mentioned either by the mortgagors personally or by realization of rents and profits by the mortgagee himself and from the tenants now occupying or those who will occupy in future less the expenses and costs of realization and all other payments to be incurred and paid in connexion therewith.

In the mortgage it is further provided:

That if the mortgagors shall repay to the mortgagee all principal moneys interest and costs charges and expenses as aforesaid on the days and in the manner aforesaid or in the event of the principal money with interest thereon having fully been reimbursed through the rent profits and income of the premises then and in such case the mortgaged premises and the premises sub-let shall at any time thereafter at the request and cost of the mortgagors be respectively reconveyed or surrendered to them or their respective heirs, administrators and assigns or as they may direct.

Now, the danger into which one is tempted to fall in construing these documents, I think, is that one is prone to regard them in the light of the events that have occurred. It so happens that the lessees who became the mortgagors are now insolvent, and the lessors are experiencing great difficulty in obtaining payment of their rent. The official assignee, although, as I am informed, he has not disclaimed the lease, has not filed a written statement, the reason being that it would probably not be worth the creditors while to contest the suit having regard to the mortgage.

I conceive it to be my duty, however, to construe these documents, not in the light of the knowledge that I now possess—for it is easy to be wise after the event—but having regard to the cir-circumstances that existed at the time when they were executed

It is admitted by learned counsel for the defendants that the effect of Cl. 3 of the mortgage was to create a mortgage by way of sub-demise of the whole of the term created under the lease, and it is further conceded that for certain purposes a sub-demise of a term without the reservation of any part of the residue thereof is treated as an assignment of the term: Beardman v. Wilson (1).

Therefore, for purposes such as creating privity of estate between the lessor and the under-lessee, or liability to pay rent, or to perform covenants running with the land, Cl. 3 of the mortgage is to be regarded as an assignment of the term. That, however, does not conclude the matter in favour of the plaintiffs, for the question that I have to consider is a very different one, namely, whether Cl. 3 amounted to a breach of the sixth covenant by the lessee. In other words, was the effect of the mortgage that the lessees, assigned, transferred, or in any way alienated their right, title and interest in the demised land and buildings, and that the lease for that reason became liable to forfeiture?

As I construe the fifth and sixth covenants of the lease it was contemplated that the lessees should be entitled to under-let, and by way of under letting to part with the possession of the demised premises and the buildings thereon if they were so minded; and it is conceded that if under Cl. 3 of the mortgage one single day at the end of the term created by the lease had been excluded from the term created by the sub-demise, no forfeiture would have occurred. Nevertheless, the plaintiffs are entitled to insist upon their legal rights.

I do not think that it was the intention of the parties to the lease of 23rd August 1910, however, that a transaction in which the term was mortgaged, whether the mortgage was a legal or equitable one, should work a forfeiture under the sixth covenant in the lease. The Court leans against forfeitures, and, in my opinion, the principle of law to be applied is that laid down by Abbott, C. J., and Bayley, J., in Doe v Hogg (2). In the course of his judgment Bayley, J. observed:

(2) [1824] 4 D. & R. 226=1 Car. & P. 160=2 L. J. (O. S.) K. B. 121.

The question in Crusoe v. Bugby (3) was whether the fact of the lessee having granted an under-lease of the premises worked a forfeiture, and the Court said that the Courts have always held a strict hand over these conditions for defeating leases. Very easy modes have always been countenanced for putting an end to them... The lessee has only deposited the lease as a security, which it was competent for him to do. There is no 'parting with the legal interest' within the meaning of the covenant, because the lessee might at any time redeem the indenture by paying off the encumbrance upon it.

In Russell v. Beccham (4) the principle laid down in Doe v. Hogg (2) was followed and applied by the Court of Appeal in England, and in that case their Lordships observed that the authorities have decided that "assign" means "part with absolutely"

Applying the principles enunciated in those cases to the fifth and sixth covenants in the lease, in my opinion the parties intended and agreed that by way of sub-demise or otherwise the lessee should be entitled to part with possession of the land and premises demised, so long as they did not absolutely transfer the whole of their right, title and interest therein.

In my opinion, it cannot reasonably be contended that under the mortgage of 7th May 1923 the lessees parted absolutely with the whole of their right, title and interest in the said premises. I need not enumerate or discuss the several clauses of the mortgage, but it appears to me to be clear that the execution of the mortgage was not a breach of the sixth covenant; and I cannot bring myself to believe, upon a true construction of the sixth covenant in the lease, that it was intended or agreed by the parties thereto that where the term was mortgaged as security for a loan in such a way that upon re-payment the term should be surrendered to the mortgagors, the mortgage should operate as a forfeiture of the lease.

In my opinion, what really has happened is that the lessors, finding that the lessees have become insolvent, are now attempting to take advantage of the ruling that a sub-demise of the whole of the term of a lease for certain purposes operates as an assignment in order to regain possession of the premises that they had demised in 1910 for 61 years.

In my opinion, upon a true construction of these documents, this attempt must

(3) [1771] W. Bl. 766=3 Wils. 234.

(4) [1924] 1 K. B. 525.

fail, and the suit will be dismissed with costs on scale No. 2, including the costs of the original defendant Lala Raghumull, which will be paid to the executors who have been substituted as defendants in his stead

As my decision upon the construction of the document is in favour of the defendants, it becomes unnecessary to determine the issue of fact as to whether or not after the forfeiture occurred it was waived by the lessors, nor do I determine whether, having regard to the state of the pleadings, it was open to the defendants to raise the issue of waiver Appeals Nos 1 and 58 of 1927, Decided on 20th July 1927, from the original orders of the Adil Dist Judge, Howrah, D/- 13th December 1926.

Civil P. C., O. 17, R. 1—Application for adjournment should not be summarily disposed of.

An application made by a party for an adjournment of a case on the ground that he was very ill and unable to attend should not be summarily disposed of without giving the applicant an opportunity of substantiating his application. [P 102 C 2]

Page, J—These appeals are against the two orders of the learned Additional District Judge of Howrah, dated the 13th December 1926. Two appeals had been preferred to the learned Additional District Judge from an order of the learned Munsif of Howrah, dismissing certain objections by the appellant to the recording of a solenama and dismissing an application by the appellant to set aside the confirmation of a sale under O 21, R 92. On the 2nd December 1926, when the appeals were fixed for hearing, the appellant was ill, and the appeals were dismissed under O 41, R 17. Thereupon, the appellant preferred an application under O. 41, R 19, for the purpose of obtaining the re-admission of each of these appeals. On the 13th December the appellant filed a petition stating that he was suffering from malaria and kala-azar and was too ill to attend, and prayed for an adjournment and there was already upon the file the certificate of a medical gentleman to the effect that he was suffering from malaria, and was very ill and unable to attend. Now, if it had been the fact that the learned District Judge had considered the matter upon the merits and had come to the conclusion that there were really nothing before him upon which he could reasonably act, I should have been slow to interfere with his order; but from the language which he used in his orders, passed on the 2nd December and on the 13th December, I think that the learned Additional District Judge acted in too summary a fashion. The conclusion at which I arrive is that he was not disposed to hear applications for postponements on account of illness on that day at all. That, as he himself stated, 95 per cent of the appeals were alleged not to be ready because of illness, and the conclusion at which I have arrived is that the learned Additional District Judge acted too summarily in the matter. What he ought to have done was to have given the appellant an opportunity of substantiating his application. Instead of that I collect from the orders themselves that he summarily disposed of the matter upon the ground that there were too many applications for adjournment on the score of illness.

For these reasons I think that the order cannot stand, and that the cases should be sent back to the learned Additional District Judge of Howrah in order that he shall consider the application of the appellant in each case which he has filed under O 41, R 19, and otherwise dispose of the appeals according to law, Costs will abide the event, the hearing-fee being assessed at two gold mohurs in each case.

Graham, J—I agree that the orders cannot be supported and that the appeals must be allowed.

Judgment.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff against a decree of the Additional District Judge of Khulna reversing the decision of the Munsif of Bagerhat. The suit out of which this appeal arises was for a declaration that the title of the plaintiff and the pro-forma defendant 9 to the property in suit has not been affected by a rent sale held in April 1921.

The facts are these: The plaintiff as well as defendant 9 were the owners of two nim howlas. These nim howlas were let out in ijara by the owners by a deed, dated 29th Jaishtha 1319, by which the father of defendant 7 named Rahimulla Akan was granted a lease for eight years of these tenures which was to end in Chaitra 1326. Rahimulla sold his pattai right to defendant 1 by a kobala dated 1st Asar 1319, (Ex 3). It is evident that by virtue of his purchase defendant 1 went into possession and paid rent to the superior landlords for two years. There was a condition in the patta of Rahimulla that he would pay the rent due to the superior landlords on behalf of his lessors, the plaintiff and defendant 9, on account of the two nim howlas. Defendant 1, as already stated, paid rent for two years of his purchase of the ijara right; but he defaulted in the payment of rent for the years 1321 to 1324. Thereupon, the landlords brought two rent suits against their tenants, that is, the plaintiff and defendant 9, and obtained two ex-parte rent decrees. In execution of those decrees the nim howlas were sold and they were purchased by defendant 1 himself. After the sale, the present plaintiffs presented an application for setting it aside on the ground of irregularity and other matters which fall within O 21, R. 90, Civil P C. That application was rejected.

After failing to have the sale set aside, the plaintiff has brought this present suit for a declaration that his right as well as that of defendant 9 in the nim howlas have not been affected by the auction sale. The plaintiff alleged that after the expiry of the ijara in 1326, he and his co-sharers got into possession of the property and they are still in possession. Defendant 1 denied his purchase of the ijara right from Rahimulla, or that he was under an obligation to pay the rent due to the superior landlords on behalf of the plaintiff and his co-sharers. The learned Munsif decided the facts in favour of the plaintiff. He held upon the evidence adduced, not only by the plaintiff but also by defendant 1 himself, that defendant 1 did actually purchase the ijara interest of Rahimulla which he had got from the plaintiff and his co-sharer. He also found that defendant 1 was under an obligation to pay the rent to the superior landlords on behalf of his vendor's lessors and, as a matter of fact, he did pay the rent for two years. Afterwards he made default as alleged by the plaintiff and purchased the property himself at the execution sale.

Upon these findings, the Munsif came to the conclusion that defendant 1 constituted himself as a trustee for the plaintiff and his co-sharer with regard to the property purchased by him and had acquired no independent title himself. This view of the law can hardly be contested, because defendant 1 being under an obligation to pay the rent of the superior landlords cannot acquire a right in himself by making default in the discharge of his own obligation. The Munsif also found that although defendant 1 by virtue of his purchase took symbolical possession, the actual possession of the tenures in question is with the plaintiff and his cosharers and he discusses the evidence in detail leading to that conclusion. He, therefore, made a decree in favour of the plaintiff and declared the nim howla rights of the plaintiff and the pro-forma defendant 9 in the lands in suit and he further declared that their title was unaffected by the auction-purchase of the defendant 1. Defendant 1 appealed against that decree. The Additional District Judge has reversed the decision of the Munsif solely upon the ground that this suit is not maintainable as it amounts to what is prohibited by the Civil Procedure Code, that is to say, a suit under O 21, R. 92, sub-R (3) which provides that no suit to set aside an order made under R 92 shall be brought by any person against whom such order is made. The Additional District Judge seems to us to be clearly in error in so holding.

The purpose of an application under O 21, R 90 is quite different. In the present suit, no decree can be made setting aside the sale for any irregularity or on any other ground mentioned in O. 21, R 90, Civil P. C. The present suit proceeds rather upon the ground that the sale is a good one, but defendant 1 holds the property for the benefit of his lessors and so far as the plaintiff and his cosharers on the one hand and defendant 1 on the other are concerned, the title to the property remains unaffected. It is quite true that the proper prayer in this case should have been to ask that defendant 1 be directed to execute a conveyance of the property in favour of the plaintiff and his cosharers. But under the circumstance that defendant 1 has not been able to get into possession and the tenures are actually in the possession of the plaintiff and his cosharers, no serious harm has been done for the prayer in the plaint not having been made in the proper form. The learned Judge, however, did not find the facts in the case, that is to say, he did not determine the issues whether defendant 1 made default in payment of the rent to the superior landlord while under an obligation to pay it by reason of the covenant in the ijara patta, and whether he had actually purchased the ijara interest of Rahimulla. We have been led through the evidence by the learned advocate on behalf of defendant 1 and we are satisfied that the estimate of the evidence by the Munsif is quite correct and the facts found by him which have not been upset by the District Judge are unassailable. There is only one passage in the Munsif's judgment with which we are unable to agree, that is, where he speaks about the mortgage-decree obtained by defendant 2, who is the son of defendant 1 against defendant 9 and his daughters in mortgage suit No 256 of 1920. The learned Munsif's view that the mortgage-decree has been wiped out by the rent sale is erroneous and it was absolutely unnecessary for him to express that opinion in the present case. The view with regard to the main question decided by the Munsif is accepted by us.

The result is that the judgment and decree of the lower appellate Court are set aside and that of the Munsif restored with this modification that defendant 1 alone will be liable for costs in all the Courts.

Appeal No 3 of 1925, Decided on 24th June 1927, from appellate decree of the Sub-Judge, 3rd Court, Mymensingh, D/- 28th June 1924.

(a) Limitation Act, Art. 142—Waste land—Possession presumed to follow title—No dispossession beyond twelve years of suit—No question of limitation arises.

Possession in respect of waste lands is presumed to follow title and in the absence of any finding as to entry by some other person on these lands beyond twelve years of suit no question of limitation can arise. There is no dispossession or discontinuance of possession, unless one person's possession terminates and is followed up by somebody else's possession. [P 105 C 2, P 106 C 1]

(b) Landlord and tenant—Question of bona fides of settlement depends on whether it was taken from person actually in possession.

The principle of the Full Bench decision in 20 Cal. 708 only applies where raiyats are settled upon land by a person in de facto possession as landlord who is afterwards found to have no title. It is not applicable to every boundary dispute or in every case where a question of parcel or no parcel arises. The question as to whether a settlement is bona fide or not depends on the circumstances as to whether the settlement was taken from a person who, although was ultimately found to have no title, was at any rate in actual possession of the lands in suit. [P 106 C 6]

Mitter, J—This is an appeal from a decision of the Subordinate Judge of Mymensingh, dated the 28th June 1924, which reversed a judgment and decree of the Munsif of Tangail, dated 12th February 1923. The appeal arises out of a suit commenced by the plaintiffs, now respondents, for a declaration of the plaintiff's zemindari right to the disputed lands and for recovery of khas possession. The case as stated in the plaint is that the suit lands were formerly waste lands and appertained to plaintiff's zemindari mouza Garaki and they were subsequently settled with the pro-forma defendants who possessed them and that sometime after the settlement defendants 1 and 2, now appellants, brought a suit against the pro-forma defendants for establishment of title to and for khas possession of the lands now in dispute.

The pro-forma defendants contested the suit but ultimately they could not continue their defence with the result that defendants 1 and 2, now appellants, obtained an ex-parte decree and in execution of that decree took khas possession of the lands now in suit. This gave rise to the cause of action in the present suit. The defence of defendants 1 and 2 was that the suit lands appertained not to plaintiff's mouza Garaki but to mouza Baradam of the pro-forma defendants. There was a local investigation and after trial the Munsif dismissed the plaintiff's suit holding that the lands appertained not to plaintiff's mouza Garaki but to mouza Baradam. The Munsif also held that the defendants being settled raiyats of Baradam acquired occupancy right to the disputed lands and could not in any event be evicted.

An appeal was carried by the plaintiffs to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Mymensingh. The learned Subordinate Judge held on a consideration of the evidence that the lands in dispute fell within the plaintiff's mouza Garaki. He also held that the plaintiffs had been in possession of the disputed lands within twelve years of suit and that the defendant's possession for a period short of twelve years did not give them any right to resist the suit for possession commenced by the plaintiffs. The Subordinate Judge accordingly allowed the appeal and decreed the plaintiff's suit in part for 3 bighas 19 cottas and 2 chataks of the disputed lands which according to the commissioner's report and map fell within the plaintiff's mouza.

Defendants 1 and 2 have, as I already said, preferred a second appeal and three points have been taken before us by the learned advocate for the appellants. It is said in the first place that the lower appellate Court was not right in not entering into the question of limitation and in not deciding on the same. It is said in the second place that in any event the defendants having taken possession of the lands from a trespasser under the bona fide belief that the said trespasser had right to these lands, were protected from eviction by reason of the principle of the decision in the Full Bench case of Binode Lal Pakrashi v. Kalu Pramanik (1). The third ground which related to the question of plaintiff's title to the suit lands was not ultimately pressed. It is now conceded on behalf of the appellants that the finding that a portion of the lands in suit (3 bighas 19 cottas 2 chataks) belongs to plaintiff's mouza Garaki cannot be challenged in second appeal.

We have now to consider the two grounds which were urged by the learned advocate for the appellants. With regard to the question of limitation the finding is that according to the defendant's own case they took settlement in the year 1316 corresponding to the English year 1909 and the suit was commenced in 1921 within twelve years of that date. Reliance has been placed with regard to this point on an entry in the settlement record, which shows that in any event the defendant's lessor was in possession in 1314 corresponding to the English year 1911. The possession was also within twelve years of the suit. The lands are waste lands and if title has been found with the plaintiffs possession in respect of these lands must be presumed to follow title and in the absence of any finding as to entry by some other persons on these lands beyond twelve years of suit no question of limitation can arise. There is no dispossession or discontinuance of possession, unless one person's possession terminates and is followed up by somebody else's possession. It is not defendant's case that any body else was in possession beyond twelve years of suit and defendant's possession on his own case began in 1909/1316 within twelve years of suit. There is, therefore, no substance in the first ground urged.

With regard to the second ground taken, the finding of the lower appellate Court is that the entry of the defendants was not in good faith as the lessor was not in actual possession of the lands. This circumstance distinguishes the present case from the Full Bench case of Bimod Lal Pakrashi v Kalu Pramanik (1). As will appear from the judgment of Sir Comer Petheram, C. J., in that case the persons from whom the tenants took the settlement were in actual possession of the zemindari within which the lands in dispute in that suit were situated and who were then the only persons who could give possession of the lands of the zamindari to the cultivators. One of the reasons of the decision in that case was that the tenant took settlement bona fide from the person who was in actual possession of the lands, which were ultimately ascertained by judgment of a Court of law not to belong to them. In this connexion the decision in the case of Tepu Mahammad v Tefayet Mahammad (2) might be referred to where Richardson, J., in delivering judgment of the Court said as follows :

Where a person has been in possession of particular estate or a particular portion of an estate as de facto landlord, it may be that raiyats settled by him on the land would have a good answer to a suit for ejectment brought by the true owner, but to carry the principle laid down by the Full Bench to the extent to which it has been carried in this case is to go much too far, and again the learned Judge said :

No case is made, therefore, for the application of the principle of the Full Bench decision. That principle only applies where raiyats are settled upon land by a person in de facto possession as landlord who is afterwards found to have no title. It is not applicable to every boundary dispute or in every case where a question of parcel or no parcel arises.

The question as to whether a settlement is bona fide or not depends on the circumstance as to whether the settlement was taken from a person who although was ultimately found to have no title, was at any rate in actual possession of the lands in suit. This distinguishes the present case from the Full Bench case. There is, therefore, no substance in the second ground urged. The appeal, therefore, fails and is dismissed with costs.

Charu Chandra Sen and Ramani Mohan Banerjee—for Respondents.

Page, J.—This is an appeal from a decree of the learned District Judge of Murshidabad affirming a decree of the learned Munsif of Jangipur. The material facts are as follows : The appellant brought a suit and obtained a decree, and in execution of that decree attached certain standing crops. The respondent claimed that the land and the crops standing upon it belonged to her and on 25th January 1919 her claim was upheld. Meanwhile, notwithstanding the claim which had been presented by the respondent, the sale was held in execution of the decree, and the standing crops were sold to a servant of the appellant. The day after the respondent had vindicated her right to the crops and had obtained an order that the crops belonged to her the appellant himself or by his agents came upon the land, cut the crops, took them away, and subsequently took possession of the proceeds of the sale. Thereupon, within three years of the decision in the claim case the plaintiff brought the present suit against the appellant and two of his servants in whose name the standing crops had been purchased for damages representing the value of the crops which had been cut and removed by the appellant, and she obtained a decree in both the lower Courts. The learned advocate who appeared for the appellant, if I may say so, had most skilfully endeavoured to obtain the reversal of these decrees upon the ground of limitation. He does not contend in second appeal, and it is not open to him to contend that the crops standing or cut did not belong to the respondent, but he claims that if the claim is to recover the crops upon the footing that they were immovable properties the plaintiff's cause of action is barred by Art. 36, Limitation Act, and if they are moveable properties it is barred by Art. 29, Limitation Act. I do not agree with him. In my opinion, this case is governed by either Art. 48 or 49, and Jenkins, C. J., in the case of Jadu Nath v. Hari Kar (1) distinguished the case (upon which the appellant relies) of Hari Charan Fadikar v. Hari Kar (2), upon the ground that in the latter case the decision proceeded upon the footing that there is nothing to show that they (the standing crops) were cut when the distress was effected, whereas in the case before him there is a distinct finding by the Munsif that the crops had been cut and being so cut were removed by the defendant.

In the present case, the finding of both Courts is that the very next day after the claim case was decided in favour of the respondent the defendant and his agents came upon the land and cut and removed the standing crops. I agree with the decision of the learned District Judge that the present case is governed by the case of Jadu Nath Dandapat v. Hari Kar (1) with the result that the appeal will be dismissed with costs.

Appeal No. 970 of 1925, Decided on 3rd August 1927, from appellate decree of the Sub-Judge, Murshidabad, D/- 13th February 1925.

Registration Act, S. 17—Document purporting to assign mortgagor's right and interest in the immovable property under mortgage not registered—Mortgagee cannot sue mortgagor for possession on the document.

The document by which the mortgagor assigns all his right and interest in the immovable property subject to the mortgage in consideration of the mortgagee forgoing his right to recover the mortgage-debt and the interest thereon exceeding Rs. 100 must necessarily be registered under S. 17, Registration Act; and if it is not registered it is not permissible for the mortgagee to rely upon that document for the purpose of founding his claim for possession against the mortgagor. [P 108 C 1]

*Jagat Chandra Bose and Sekhar Kumar Bose—*for Appellants.

*Hemendra Chandra Sen—*for Respondents.

Judgment—This suit is brought to recover khas possession of certain land on declaration of the plaintiff's title thereto. The lower appellate Court has passed a decree in favour of the plaintiff in respect of one only of the plots of land in dispute. Now, the plaintiff seeks to recover khas possession. He was a mortgagee of the property in suit and the mortgage-debt and the interest thereon at all material times exceeded Rs. 100 and it has been found as a fact by the lower appellate Court that the value of the mortgaged property was not Rs. 100. In his capacity as a mortgagee the plaintiff is not entitled to immediate khas possession of the property. But in support of his claim to khas possession he tendered in evidence a document in the following manner:

Being unable to pay up the mortgage debt, principal and interest I give up the right and possession of the properties mortgaged to the mortgagee and by so doing I am absolved from the liability of the mortgage debt.

That document was not registered, but it was the foundation of the plaintiff's claim to possession in the suit.

The only issue which need be considered upon this appeal is whether or not

(1) [1913] 17 C. W. N. 308=18 I. C. 258=17 C. L. J. 206.

(2) [1905] 32 Cal. 459=9 C. W. N. 376.

it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove that this document had been duly registered 'before it became admissible in evidence for the purpose of proving his title to khas possession. The document was in Bengali, but as we apprehend the meaning of the document, (it has been translated into English) we think that the effect of the document was that the mortgagor assigned all his right and interest in the immovable property subject to the mortgage in consideration of the mortgagee forgoing his right to recover the mortgage-debt and the interest thereon. In our opinion, a document of that description must necessarily be registered under S. 17, Registration Act, and if it was not registered it was not permissible for the plaintiff to rely upon that document for the purpose of founding his claim in the suit. The result is that this document was not admissible in evidence and the plaintiff's claim to khas possession of the one plot for which the decree was passed in the lower appellate Court must fail.

The result is that the appeal is allowed, the decree appealed against set aside and the suit dismissed with costs in all Courts.

The cross-objection is not pressed and is dismissed without costs

Appeal No 50 of 1926 and Civil Revision No 364 of 1926, Decided on 14th April 1927, from the original decree of the 2nd Sub-Judge, Mymensingh, D/- 2nd January 1926.

(a) Civil P. C., S. 96 (3)—Nature of compromise in dispute—Appeal lies.

Roy, J.—Where the dispute is over the nature of a compromise, the appellant has a right in appeal to show what the compromise was.

(b) Civil P. C., Sch. 2, Para. 1—Forms and steps prescribed in Sch. 2 must be complied with.

The Code of Civil Procedure uses words "arbitration" and "reference to arbitration" as used in common parlance but lays down certain forms and steps for a reference to arbitration and for the award made by the arbitrator to be embodied in the decree of the Court, and unless these forms and steps are followed it is idle to appeal to the provisions of the schedule of the Civil Procedure Code.

Where the petition of compromise does not contemplate that any award was to be made by the arbitrator and that it should be embodied in the judgment of the Court, provisions of Sch. 2, do not apply.

The person named declined to make the partition with the result that the compromise was hung up.

Held . that the compromise so far as the suit was concerned must be, in the circumstances of case, taken to have fallen through and the only course for the trial Court was to proceed with the trial of the suit.

Jogesh Chandra Roy and Krishna Komal Moutra—for Respondents

Roy, J.—This appeal is directed against the decree passed by the Sub-Judge, 2nd Court, Mymensingh, amending the decree passed by his predecessor in the suit brought by the plaintiff. We learn that the plaintiff commenced this action in the Munsif's Court but the valuation of the suit was found to be over Rs 5,000 and it came eventually before the Sub-Judge. It is said that defendants 4 and 5 were owners of some parcels of land in villages Gangatiya and Saidpur lying within Kharija taluk No 1760/28 of the Mymensingh Collectorate and that they were in exclusive possession of some of the plots and were in possession of some shares in the other plots with the other defendants 1 and 3 who owned the remaining shares. The plaintiff alleged that defendants 4 and 5 sold half of what they had in these plots to the plaintiff by a kobala dated 26th June 1915, but the said defendants subsequently colluded with defendants 1 and 3 and allowed the latter to take possession of these lands.

The plaintiff thereupon brought the present suit (from which this appeal arises) and he sought to establish his title to the lands he purchased and asked for partition and for khas possession of his share in these lands. Defendants 1 and 3 disputed plaintiff's title and that of his vendors and the vendors denied the sale. Issues were drawn up and after protracted proceedings a commission was taken out to examine the plaintiff who resides in Calcutta. Before the commissioner the parties entered into a compromise and this was embodied in a petition dated 16th March 1925.

The decision of the case turns on the terms of this petition of compromise. The plaintiff gave up his claim based on his alleged purchase. It was settled that the lands in these villages Gangatiya and Saidpur appertaining to Taluk 1760/28 were to be divided between the plaintiff and his cosharers on one side and defendants 1, 2 and 3 on the other, proportionately to the admitted shares they had therein, on reference to the last settlement survey. The plaintiff and his cosharers and defendants, 1, 2, and 3 appointed Babu Sarat Chandra Bhattacharjee a pleader to be the arbitrator. The arbitration was to equalize possession as far as possible and it was agreed that after the said arbitrator had made the proposed division the plaintiff would withdraw from the suit and the defendants would withdraw the allegations they had made with respect to the plaintiff's purchase. Babu Sarat Chandra declined to arbitrate. Efforts were made to have a joint petition filed agreeing on a partition by some other person or persons but these efforts were unsuccessful. The learned Sub-Judge thereafter on plaintiff's petition, purporting to act under S. 5(3), Sch 2 Civil P C, called on defendants 1 and 3 to appoint an arbitrator. The defendants objected and protested that there was no reference to arbitration as understood under Sch. 2, Civil P. C., that the petition of compromise dated 16th March 1925, was not signed by all the parties and that the compromise did not relate to the subject-matter of the suit and so on, but the learned Sub-Judge refused to listen to any objection and being of opinion that the defendants were trying to back out of the compromise they had entered into "on flimsy technicalities" he appointed a pleader Babu Satyaranjan Guha as an arbitrator in place of Babu Sarat Chandra Bhattacharjee and asked him to complete the division.

This gentleman filed a so-called award though the defendants objected and protested all throughout that the proceedings were illegal and ultra vires. The award was returned by the learned Sub Judge for consideration on a particular point. The pleader re-filed his award and thereafter the learned Sub-Judge made a decree in conformity with the said award, the defendants objecting and protesting throughout these proceedings. The defendants 1, 2 and 3, then filed an application for amendment of the decree to bring it in conformity with the judgment of the Sub-Judge. It came for hearing before his successor and he had no hesitation in deleting the so-called award from the decree. The decree as it stands now, merely states that the claim of the plaintiff is treated as withdrawn without liberty to bring a fresh suit and the allegations made by the defendants in their written statements in the kobala of the plaintiff are deleted.

The plaintiff has appealed and the learned vakil appearing for the plaintiff seeks to restore the previous decree which was achieved and which proposed to embody the arbitrator's so-called award. The appeal to say the least, is audacious.

Certain preliminary objections were taken by the learned vakil for the respondents. They are not serious; one was that no appeal lay from a decree which is based on a compromise. The contention of the plaintiff is that the whole compromise has been struck out. The dispute is over the nature of the compromise and the plaintiff has a right in appeal to show what the compromise was. The second ground is that the period of limitation should be counted from the date of the original decree and that counted from that time the appeal is barred. The plaintiff was not aggrieved, however, until the amended decree was passed and he is within time from that point of time allowance being made for time taken in obtaining a copy. The third ground is that the stamp fee of Rs 20 is insufficient and ad valorem fees should have been paid. The answer of the plaintiff that so far as the present dispute is concerned it is in respect of partition and that at any rate the relief claimed is not capable of being valued, seems sufficient.

Returning to the merits of the case it may be mentioned that the words 'arbitration' and 'reference to arbitration' are used in common parlance. The Civil Procedure Code uses the same expressions but lays down certain forms and steps for a reference to arbitration and for the award made by the arbitrator to be embodied in the decree of the Court, and unless these forms and steps are followed it is idle to appeal to R 5 of the Sch. 2, Civil P C by which the learned Sub-Judge purported to have appointed Babu Satyaranjan Guha as arbitrator in place of Babu Sarat Chandra Bhattacharjee who refused to act. S. 1, Sch. 2, Civil P. C. says that where all the parties to a suit agree that any matter in difference between them shall be referred to arbitration, they may before judgment is pronounced, apply to the Court for an order of reference. Clearly there was no such application before the Court nor did the Court make an order of reference as contemplated by S 3. Finally the Court has to pronounce judgment according to the award of the arbitrator. The petition of compromise does not contemplate that any award was to be made by the arbitrator and that it should be embodied in the judgment of the Court. The learned Sub-Judge seems to have realized this for in his judgment he states :

a petition of compromise is more appropriate in describing it rather than a petition of reference to arbitration. For there is no prayer in this petition that the suit would be disposed of in terms of the award filed by the Salis (arbitrator) or that the award would be incorporated into a decree

In spite of this conclusion he, however, fell back on R. 5, Sch. 2 and holding that this rule has a wide application and he could act on it, disposed of the matter by saying that he appointed another gentleman to effect the partition according to the original wishes of the parties. He says this gentleman has filed his report. Call it an award or anything else. The partition has been effected and as the parties are bound by their petition of 16th March 1925, the suit will be disposed of in its terms.

On the face of it this was very arbitrary and the learned Sub-Judge who succeeded could hardly maintain the so-called award of this kind. He held that his predecessor had treated the petition of 16th March 1925 as a petition of compromise and he thought that so much of the compromise that the plaintiff would withdraw from suit without liberty to bring a fresh suit and that the defendants would withdraw their imputations against the purchase, could be maintained and he thereupon deleted the award and amended the decree

The learned vakil appearing for the plaintiff has referred to O 23, R. 3 and he seeks to justify the action taken by the trial Judge thereunder. All the parties did not join and all that the petition said was that there will be a partition done by pleader Sarat Babu and on his doing so the suit would be withdrawn and the imputations against the plaintiff deleted. Sarat Babu declined to make the partition with the result that the compromise was hung up. If it be argued as the trial Judge did, that there was a valid compromise between the parties, viz., that the lands would be divided according to their respective shares it is not clear how the trial Judge could insist on carrying it through in the manner he did. The plaintiff may have his remedy elsewhere, but it could not be done in this suit. The plaintiff gave up his claim based on a purchase and the compromise was in respect of something else. The compromise did not relate to the subject matter of the suit. New parties were again brought in, viz, the principal co-sharers. The compromise, so far as the suit before us is concerned must be in the circumstances of the case taken to have fallen through and the only order in my opinion which the Subordinate Judge could have passed on 3rd April 1925 was that he should proceed with the trial of the suit.

The amended decree cannot be maintained for the simple reason that the compromise was not completed. The suit was to be withdrawn and the imputations made by the defendants also withdrawn on the happening of a certain event, viz, the division of the lands by pleader Sarat Babu. That contingency did not happen and the petition of compromise cannot be acted upon ; for obviously the two parts are connected and it would not be right to pass a decree on a portion of the compromise ignoring the first part. We do not know of course what the plaintiff wishes to do, viz, to continue the suit from the point the compromise could not be effected or seek his remedy on the settlement that the lands are to be divided according to the admitted shares of the parties. In the present suit we must leave out the compromise. In case the plaintiff wishes to continue the suit he should be given the chance. As the amended decree stands he cannot and a future suit by him may also be barred as it happened in the case of Gulkandi Lal v. Manni Lal (1).

The original decree has been superseded. It cannot be restored. The amended decree shall also be set aside. The appeal, therefore, is allowed in part. The parties are relegated to the position they stood on 3rd April 1925. The learned Judge will now allow the plaintiff to continue his suit from that day and thereafter dispose of it according to law. The contesting respondents will get their costs, the hearing-fee being assessed at three gold mohurs. The plaintiff-appellant had an application in revision as an alternative on which a Rule was issued. The Rule is discharged.

Mukerji, J.—I have had the advantage of reading the judgment which my learned brother is about to deliver. I agree in his conclusions and the order which he has proposed to pass, and I desire to add a few words.

The true character of the petition dated the 16th March 1925 appears to have been very much misconceived by the Court below. Obviously it is not and cannot be regarded as an application to file in Court an agreement to refer to arbitration such as is contemplated by Cl 17, Sch 2, or as an application to file in Court an award made in an arbitration held without the intervention of the Court, as provided for by Cl. 20, Sch. 2. Could it be treated as an application to the Court for an order of reference within the meaning of Cl. 1, Sch. 2? The Court below treated it as such an application, and made an order under Cl. 3 stating that the arbitrator was to do the work mentioned in the petition within two weeks (vide O.74, dated 31st March 1925), an order appointing a new arbitrator under Cl. 5, (vide Orders. 74 D/- 3rd April 1925, No. 80, D/-18th April 1925, and No. 81, dated 29th May 1925, orders extending the time for filing the award under Cl. 8, vide Order 83, dated 30th May 1925, and No. 84, dated 15th June 1925) and also an order remitting the award under Cl 14 (vide O 87, dated 29th June 1925). There are several weighty reasons why the petition cannot be regarded as one made for an order for reference in a pending suit such as Cl 1 contemplates. In the first place the petition does not contain any prayer for such reference, and it does not appear anywhere that it was in the contemplation of the parties that there should be a judgment according to the award. Secondly, the foundation of the jurisdiction of the Court is an agreement between all parties interested. As pointed out by the Judicial Committee in Ghulam Khan v. Muhammad Hossein (2), in dealing with Ch 37 of the Code of 1882 in which the words were "where in any suit all the parties agree," the agreement to refer and the application to the Court founded upon it must have the concurrence of all parties concerned and the actual reference is the order of the Court, and that large powers are given to the Court with the view of making the award in such case complete, operative and final. The word 'interested' was added by the Code of 1908 to give effect to the decision in Pitam Mal v. Sadiq Ali (3), which laid down that the words "all the parties to a suit" would not necessarily include parties who never put in any appearance in the Court, and between whom and any of the parties to the submission there was not in fact any matter in difference in the suit.

In the present case defendants 4 and 5 were not parties to the agreement. They no doubt denied having any interest in the subject matter of the suit, but plaintiff claimed relief as against them, and, therefore, it cannot be said that they are not parties interested. Moreover the agreement affected the shares of the plaintiff and his co sharers, but it is not known who these cosharers are and what their shares are. Thirdly, the expression "any matter in difference" must mean matter in difference arising in the suit. This is clear from the context, as well as the form prescribed for an order of reference, Form No. 2 of the Appendix. That this is so has been explained by the Judicial Committee in the case of Ram Protap Chamria v. Durga Prosad Chamria (4). In the present case what the arbitrator had to do was wholly outside the scope of the pleadings in the suit. The Subordinate Judge, therefore, was clearly wrong in proceeding on the supposition that the petition of the 16th March 1925 was one which gave him jurisdiction to proceed under paras. 1 to 16, of Sch. 2.

The intention of the parties appears clearly from the wording of the petition itself. It stated:

The arbitrator shall within 14 days from this day, or as soon as possible, make the division in the aforesaid manner. After the aforesaid arbitrator files his report in Court after effecting the division in the aforesaid manner, the plaintiff shall withdraw the aforesaid suit No. 269 of 1922 of the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Mymensingh, without permission to institute a fresh suit, and after the plaintiff withdraws the aforesaid suit, the defendants shall withdraw the allegations made in their written statement against the truth of the plaintiff's purchase.

It was an adjustment by a lawful agreement or compromise which the petition purported to notify to the Court as contemplated by O. 23, R. 3, and if the terms were carried out, as intended, by the arbitrator appointed by the parties, it could have been recorded and the suit allowed to be withdrawn and dismissed, and the objectionable passages in the written statement could have been deleted. If the adjustment had taken place, that is to say if the said arbitrator had not refused to act but had done what was expected, and the compromise or agreement would then have been recited in the decree, though the decree would have been confined in its operation to so much of the subject-matter of the suit as was dealt with by the agreement [Hemanta Kumari Debi v Midnapur Zemindary Co (5)], the result of the proceedings before the arbitrator and his award could not have been enforced under O. 23, R. 3: Delari Tea Co, Ltd v India General Steam Navigation Co, Ltd (6), Amar Chand v Banwari Lal Rakshit (7). The agreement, however, fell through as the arbitrator appointed did not act.

Landlord and tenant—Rent payable in kind—Money to be paid in lieu of kind fixed—Tenant can choose between payment of rent in money or kind—Landlord cannot insist on the payment of market value of grain payable as rent.

Where a sum is fixed as payable by the tenant in lieu of paddy to be delivered by him as rent, unless there is a strong indication that this money value was placed for some other purpose than that of giving the tenant a choice either to pay money or deliver the paddy, it must be taken that the tenant has the choice either to pay money or to deliver paddy as stipulated. B. B. Where a sum is fixed as payable by the tenant in lieu of paddy which is to be delivered by him as rent, unless there is a strong indication that this money value was placed for some other purpose than that of giving the tenant a choice either to pay money or to deliver the paddy, it must be taken that the tenant has the choice either to pay money or to deliver paddy as stipulated. Appeal No 389 of 1925, Decided on 15 h July 1927, from appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Khulna, D/- 27th September 1924.

B. B. Ghose, J—This is an appeal by defendants 1, 2 and 6 against the decision of the Subordinate Judge of Khulna. The suit out of which this appeal arises was one for ejectment of the defendants with regard to a small area of land of 2½ bighas which defendant 2 held under the superior landlords of the plaintiff, defendants 7 and 8, by a kabuliyat dated 4th of Magh 1309 B S. This land with other lands constituted a holding which previously was held by the husband of defendant 2. The pro-forma defendants 7 and 8, who were the landlords, brought the holding to sale in execution of their rent-decree and purchased it themselves. They re-settled the disputed land with defendant 2 by accepting the kabuliyat I have already mentioned. Subsequently the pro-forma defendants 7 and 8 created an intermediate interest in favour of the plaintiff by granting him a sub-lease. The plaintiff's case is that by this transaction, he became the immediate landlord of defendant 2. Defendant 2 sold this disputed property to defendant 1, by a kobala dated the 3rd Falgoun 1327 B S corresponding to 15th February 1921, and thereby, according to the plaintiff, she forfeited her tenancy. Defendant 6 claimed as under tenure-holder under a permanent lease granted to him by defendant 2. The plaintiff based his claim on two grounds : firstly, that the interest of defendant 2 was that of an occupancy raiyat and that by reason of the transfer there had been an abandonment of the holding on account of which he was entitled to khas possession.

The second branch, and which is more important in our view, is that under the terms of the lease of 1309 B S under which defendant held that land, she was precluded from transferring the property in any way, either by sale or gift or in any other manner. It was also stipulated in the kabuliyat that in the case of any of the acts of transfer done by the tenant, the landlord would have the right of re-entry and take khas possession of the property. The Munsif dismissed the suit on the ground that defendant 2 was in possession of a certain area of the land in question by taking a settlement from her transferee, defendant 1. The plaintiff appealed against that decision and the Subordinate Judge has decreed the suit basing his judgment upon two grounds. The Subordinate Judge has held that the right of defendant 2 was only that of an occupancy raiyat whose right was not transferable without the sanction of the landlord. Having purchased this property the purchaser had taken no interest and they were liable to ejectment ; and defendant 6 having taken a permanent under-lease in violation of the provisions of S 85 could not resist the landlord's claim. The Subordinate Judge also held that the plaintiff was entitled to evict defendant 2, under the general law on the ground of transfer in breach of the condition in the kabuliyat. This view of law does not appear to have been properly developed in the Subordinate Judge's judgment and this question appears to have been dealt with only perfunctorily.

In the appeal, on behalf of the defendants-appellants, the learned advocate admitted that he has no case with regard to defendants 1 and 6. But he argues with great deal of force that defendant 2, not having abandoned the possession of the holding, is not liable to be ejected, and that, therefore, the judgment of the Subordinate Judge should be reversed at least to the extent of the land which is actually in the possession of that defendant. There has been a number of cases which have given rise to a conflict of opinion on the question of the liability of a tenant to be ejected, if he transfers the holding but remains in possession of the whole or a part of it by taking a sub-lease from the transferee and if there is no repudiation of the liability for the payment of rent with regard to the holding.

In my view which I have expressed in various cases, it is unfortunate that this Court in several reported decisions has held that there can be an abandonment of a holding apart from the provisions of S 87, Bengal Tenancy Act. If this Court had from the very commencement of the Bengal Tenancy Act adopted the view that unless there was an abandonment as defined under S. 87, Bengal Tenancy Act, the landlord would not be entitled to khas possession on the ground of a mere transfer by a raiyat having an occupancy right, a good deal of litigation would have been saved. But unfortunately a different view has been taken in a large number of cases which has caused a good deal of misery as well as waste of money. The last of the cases on the question has set forth a view which, I think, might have been accepted from the very commencement. I mean the case of Romesh Chandra v. Daiba Charan (1).

If the present appeal had merely rested upon the question as to the transfer being made by an occupancy raiyat, I should have gladly followed the above case. But in the present case there is a quite different aspect and it arises from its special terms of the covenant by which the lease was granted to defendant 2. There is no dispute that defendant 2 transferred the interest she had acquired by the kabuliya of 1309 B. S. to defendant 1 by describing her interest as a permanent mokarari middleman's interest. This act of transfer inter vivos gives the landlord the right to bring an action in ejectment on the ground of forfeiture, as there is a right of re-entry expressly reserved in the lease of which he has taken advantage. In reply the learned advocate for the appellant states that in spite of this breach the tenant, defendant 2, was entitled to a notice under S 155, sub-S. 1 (b), Bengal Tenancy Act. The difficulty in accepting this contention, is whether defendant 2 was a tenant after the forfeiture incurred by her, and the landlord indicated his desire to take advantage of the forfeiture. This question was raised and decided in the case of Dwarika Nath v. Mathura Nath (2). Sir Lancelot Sanderson, the late Chief Justice, and the late Mr Justice Mukerjee have dealt with this question in their different judgments in extenso. The reasonings in those judgments may very well be accepted. This appeal must, therefore, fail and is dismissed with costs.

Suresh Chandra Talukdar—for Petitioner

Judgment—This is a rule against an order refusing an application for addition of a party as a co-respondent in a suit under the Indian Divorce Act. The application was rejected by the Court below. The plaintiff obtained a rule against that order. As it is not the usual practice of this Court to interfere in revision with an order made by the lower Court in an interlocutory matter this application is rejected. If the petitioner has any real grievance on account of the adverse order by the Court below he has a right of appeal against the final order, and upon the appeal this Court will be able to pass the proper order.

The rule is, therefore, discharged. No order is made as to costs as there is no appearance on behalf of the opposite party.

Letters Patent Appeal No. 12 of 1927, Decided on 22nd July 1927, against decision of Majumdar, J., D/- 7th March 1927, in appeal from appellate decree No 2103 of 1924.

Bengal Land Registration Act (7 of 1876), S. 78—Rent suit for—Land in possession of tenants comprised in a number of estates—Co-sharer proprietor's interest in respect of one estate partially registered in the collectorate—Rent proportionate to his entire estate realized by him for over 30 years without any objection—Inference.

Section 78 has no application to cases where the land in possession of the tenant is comprised in more than one estate. The proprietor mentioned in the section is the proprietor of one estate within the ambit of which the lands in possession of the tenants are comprised : 15 C. L. J. 308, Foll. [P 116 C 1]

The section is enacted to compel people or to give them an adequate notice to obey the provisions which require registration to be made of their interests in land. It is a section in aid of S. 38. It gives a certain sanction inducing people to make sure to register their interests.

Where a tenancy extended to entire land of four touzis in which the plaintiffs had 4 annas 12 gandas share and the defendants held all the lands of the said four touzis at a consolidated rent of Rs. 179-2-8 gandas and had been paying Rs. 49 odd to the plaintiffs as their share of rent and with reference to the last touzis the plaintiff's name was registered only with reference to 19-1/4 gandas.

Held that the plaintiff would not be debarred by S. 78 from realizing rent at the rate claimed by them. Further held that the inference in such a case would be that the rent which the defendants have been in the habit of paying for many years is really due as between the plaintiff on the one hand and the defendants on the other.

Rankin, C. J.—This is the defendant's appeal from the judgment and decree of my learned brother Mr. Justice Majumdar affirming a decision of the lower appellate Court.

The plaintiff is one of several co-owners of four revenue-paying estates with separate touzi numbers. It appears that the whole of the area of these four touzis has been settled in talukdari right with the defendants for a consolidated jama of Rs. 179-2-8 gandas. In my judgment, the circumstance that the tenure is co-extensive with the whole area of the four touzis is of no importance for the present purpose, but it is a fact, as I understand, that the whole of the land comprised in the four touzis is comprised in this tenure at the consolidated rent of Rs 179-2-8 gandas

The facts are these: that the plaintiff is registered in the collectorate as having in three of the touzis a share of 4 annas 8 gandas and in one of the touzis as having a share of 19-1/4 gandas not quite one anna. The suit was brought on the footing that the plaintiff had an equal share in all the four, that being put as 4 annas 12 gandas. In point of fact the share of the plaintiff is now admitted to have been wrongly stated in the plaint and the facts are as I have given. Upon that footing the plaintiff bringing his suit for rent is met with the provisions of S. 78, Land Registration Act (VII B C of 1876). It is said that it is wrong to give judgment for the amount claimed by the plaintiff because under that section a tenant is entitled to say that he will pay no greater share of the rent to a co-sharer landlord than the landlord is registered in the collectorate as having.

Mr. Justice Majumdar has disagreed with the figure found by the learned Munsiff and has criticized his calculation in a way which seems to me to be sound, that is to say, he has shown that the Munsiff's calculation is based upon an assumption that one can treat each of the touzis as of equal value for the purpose of apportioning rent. On the question whether S. 78 applies to a case like this Mr. Justice Majumdar has followed the decision of Mr. Justice Mookerjee and Justice Teunon in Rakhal Das Adhyay v. Prodyot Kumar Tagore (1). He has held that it is not right to apply S. 78 to any case except the case of a holding under one single estate or revenue-free property. The case before Mr. Justice Mookerjee was a case where the plaintiff was a co-sharer landlord, the tenancy lands comprised lands in more than one touzi and the plaintiff was interested as co-sharer in one or more touzis but not in all. The Court disposing of that case gives as its opinion that a close examination of the section makes it reasonably plain that it has no application to cases where the land in possession of the tenant is comprised in more than one estate; and again that the proprietor mentioned in the section is the proprietor of one estate within the ambit of which the lands in possession of the tenants are comprised. It has been pointed out to us that that reasoning goes further than was necessary for the decision of that case because, on the facts of that case, it was found to be one where the lands in occupation of the tenants were comprised, in a number of estates in one or more of which alone the plaintiff was interested. In my judgment, the present case, where the plaintiff is interested in all the touzis but not to the same extent in each, is just as strong a case on the facts for the purpose of excluding S. 78 as the case before Mr Justice Mookerjee. In both cases S. 78 is inapplicable because it cannot be applied. It is not possible in this case to say, without assuming that each of those touzis is of the same value for purposes of apportioning rent, what is the share that these tenants are bound to pay; and, in my judgment, therefore, whether that case went beyond what was necessary or not, the present case is just as strong as that in favour of the landlord. I think, however, that the proposition that S. 78 has no application to cases where the land in possession of the tenant is comprised in more than one estate is a sound proposition, particularly as regards the second part of S. 78. It is quite true that S. 78 is enacted to compel people or to give them an adequate motive to obey the provisions which require registration to be made of these interests in land. S. 78 is controlled by S. 81 which contains a saving for the conditions of any written contract, but it is a section in aid of S. 38.

It is quite true that one might be disposed to argue that for that reason S. 78 must apply to all cases, a revenue-paying estate or revenue-free property and that as nothing is intended to be left uncovered under S. 38 so nothing is left to be uncovered or out of the reach of S. 78. That, however, is not, I think, a valid argument. S. 78 gives a certain sanction inducing people to make sure to register their interests, but it may well be that the legislature has thought it sufficient sanction if in all cases where there are tenancies confined to one revenue-paying estate the proprietor is apt to lose what he does not register. From the nature of the case it could not well go further without creating difficulties. It does not follow that the sanction will hit every case because the intention is to require a complete registration.

In my judgment, in this case the learned Judge has rightly decided that S. 78 was of no avail to the defendants. Had it been, I think the result of the case would have been different, because no estoppel would prevail against the statute. But, in my judgment, the estoppel by the statute not being shown, there is in the rest of the case no difficulty in holding that the rent which the defendants have been in the habit of paying for many years is really due as between the plaintiff on the one hand and the defendants on the other. I think, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Mitter, J.—This is an appeal from a decision of the District Judge of Murshidabad, dated 10th February 1925, which affirmed a decision of the Munsif of Jangipur, dated 18th December 1923

The appeal arises out of a suit commenced by the plaintiff to recover possession of a plot of 2 bighas 6 cottas odd in area. The case of the plaintiff is that this land originally belonged to one Jhabu Sheikh who mortgaged this plot along with three other plots to one Bogdad Biswas in the year 1900. In 1908 Jhabu mortgaged plot 1 with the plaintiff. The plaintiff instituted a suit on his mortgage and obtained a decree in the year 1915, and in execution of that decree he purchased plot 1 on 19th August 1916. Some time in 1920 Bogdad obtained a decree on his mortgage with reference to the four plots mortgaged to him and in execution of that decree he purchased the mortgaged property namely, the four plots. On 9th December 1920 he sold this property to the present defendant. The plaintiff alleges that he was dispossessed by Bogdad, the first mortgagee. There was a proceeding under O. 21, R. 100, Civil P. C., at the instance of the plaintiff in which he succeeded. On 7th March 1921 the plaintiff recovered possession, but he was again dispossessed in June 1921. He brought a suit under S. 9, Specific Relief Act, in which he failed. Consequently he commenced the present suit for possession of the property now in suit.

Both the Courts below have decreed the plaintiff's suit and granted him possession in respect of the disputed land.

In this second appeal it has been contended by the learned advocate for the defendant that the plaintiff can only obtain possession conditional on his redeeming the first mortgage in which Bogdad, the original mortgagee, was interested and whose right has now passed to the defendant by his purchase. The question which we have to determine is whether the plaintiff is entitled to a decree for possession without any condition, or whether he can only succeed on his redeeming the first mortgage or the defendant who now stands in the shoes of the first mortgagee. Both the lower Courts seem to think that this relief cannot be given to the defendant in the present suit. I think that the Courts below are clearly wrong. It is not necessary to have another suit in which the right between the plaintiff and the defendant as purchasers in execution of the two mortgage decrees respectively should be determined. The matter can be determined in the present litigation, and to avoid multiplicity of suits it is desirable that the matter should be determined in the present suit.

In these circumstances, I think that the decree of the trial Court, as affirmed by that of the lower appellate Court, should be varied by an order that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover possession conditional on his redeeming the first mortgage within a certain time to be fixed by the trial Court. The case, therefore, is remitted to the Court of first instance for the purpose of fixing the time during which the plaintiff would be allowed to redeem the first mortgage of the year 1900 and also for determining upon what terms he would be allowed to redeem.

Rankin, C. J.—I agree. I should like to say that in my opinion, the true law in this matter is laid down in the case of Kalu Sharip v. Abhoy Charan (1) and in the case of Bhagaban Chandra v. Tarak Chandra (2). As regards the point about the order under O. 21, R. 100, Civil P. C., the plaintiff at that time was in possession and the order under that rule was made originally in his favour because he could not have been ejected by the first mortgagee. There was no need to bring a suit to set aside that order which was perfectly right. Since then the plaintiff got out of possession and he failed under S. 9, Specific Relief Act, and, therefore, he has come before the Court not merely on the basis of his own possession which is gone, but on the merits of the claim, which makes all difference. That makes applicable the two cases to which I have referred.

In this case the Munsif's order giving the plaintiff the costs of the trial must be varied and the order for costs before the Munsif will be that each party will bear his own costs. But the plaintiff must pay the costs of the two appeals and those costs will be added to the sum due on the mortgage. So that the plaintiff would have to pay those as a condi-

Decided on 6th April 1927, against the decree of Cuming, J

(a) Limitation Act, Art. 142—Plaintiff must prove that he was in possession within 12 years—When land is incapable of possession plaintiff must prove his title as well and show that no one else was in possession.

In an action for ejectment under Art. 142 the plaintiff has always to show that he was in possession within 12 years of suit. But in the case of land which cannot be availed of at all, such as jungle land, the plaintiff may show that he was in possession before 12 years and make a case by showing as an additional fact either that the land in question was incapable of possession by anyone or that in fact no one was interfering with his right during the 12 years before suit. It is possession, not user, that has to be shown. A. I. R. 1924 Cal 855 and A. I. R. 1922 Cal. 551, Ref [P 121 C 2, P 122 C 1]

(b) Practice—New plea—Suit for ejectment on actual possession and dispossession—Whether plaintiff can subsequently put forward a case of constructive possession depends on circumstances—Court has discretion—Limitation Act, Art. 142

Whether it is open to the plaintiff, where he puts forward a definite case of actual possession and dispossession, when that case fails, to turn round and put forward a case of constructive possession depends upon the circumstances, upon the points at issue and the way in which he has pleaded. It is a matter in the Court's discretion. [P 122 C 2]

The judgments appealed from were as follows:

Cuming, J.—The facts of the case out of which this appeal arises are as follows. There is a tract of land in the Sunderbuns of which defendant 1 took a lease from the Government and in 1901 the plaintiff's vendor obtained a lease of some 100 bighas of this land from defendant 1. In 1906 the lease which had been granted to the plaintiff's vendor's lessor was cancelled by the Government and a fresh lease was granted on the 16th August 1907. The plaintiff purchased the lease of Kalachand in the year 1910. It was his case in the first Court that he was in possession of his land by cutting wood and exercising other acts of possession till he was dispossessed by defendants 2 and 3 in 1914. Defendants 4 and 5, the purchasers of the interests of defendants 2 and 3, contested the suit. Their main ground was that the suit was barred by limitation both general and special and that the plaintiff had acquired no title to the land in suit by his purchase which was not a genuine transaction, that even if the alleged purchase was a genuine one, the identity of the land in suit could not be established in the locale and that the plaintiff's vendor's title was extinguished when the lease to defendant 1 was cancelled in 1906.

A number of issues were framed and the first Court decided the case in favour of the plaintiff and decreed the suit with costs. On appeal to the District Court the learned District Judge held that the plaintiff's case was barred by limitation, and hence he allowed the appeal and dismissed the suit.

The plaintiff has appealed to this Court. He has contended that the suit was not barred by limitation. The case which he now seeks to make to avoid the bar of limitation is that the dispossession took place in 1908 when defendant 1 granted a lease to defendants 2 and 3. Up to that time he was in constructive possession, because he had title to the land and the land was virgin jungle and no one else was in possession. As there were no acts of possession exercised on the land possession is to be considered as following the title.

The main difficulty that I have in accepting this contention of the learned advocate for the appellant is that this was not the case which the appellant made in his plaint. His case in his plaint was that both he and his vendor were in actual possession. No case of constructive possession was suggested by him in his plaint and the defendants had not to meet any case of constructive possession. The case which they had to meet was that of actual possession and dispossession. The plaintiff was suing in eject-ment and therefore he must prove his possession within 12 years of the date of the suit. As I have pointed out the case he made in his plaint was that he had been dispossessed in the year 1914. Having made in his plaint a definite case that he was in actual possession and that his vendor was also in actual possession of the land in suit, it is not open to him now in second appeal to turn round and to avoid the bar of limitation put forward an entirely different case based on constructive possession. To succeed in the case which he now puts forward he would have to prove that no one else exercised any act of possession over the land and that hence the possession must be held to follow the title: the defendants in that case would have this definite case to meet and their evidence would have been directed towards the meeting of such a case. As I have already said that was not the case made in the Court of first instance. As Mr. Justice Chatterjea points out in the case of Iakhal Chandra Ghose v. Durgadas Samanta (1) such a course is not open to the plaintiff where he puts forward a definite case of actual possession and dispossession: it is not open to him, when that case fails, to turn round and put forward a case of constructive possession which obviously depends upon entirely different facts which, if the defendants had to meet, they would, doubtless, have brought forward entirely different evidence. I have therefore no reason to differ from the finding of the learned District Judge that the plaintiff's case is barred by limitation. I would therefore dismiss the appeal with costs. My learned brother is for allowing the appeal. The result is this appeal is dismissed with costs under S. 98, Civil P. C.

B. B. Ghose, J.—I regret that I have to differ from my learned brother. The findings of fact arrived at by the Court of appeal below are these: defendant 1 obtained from the Government a lease of some land in the Sunderbuns. He gave a permanent lease of some 100 bighas out of this land to one Kalachand in 1901. This land has been found to have been virgin jungle. Subsequently there was an order by the Government for resumption of this land for non-performance of certain terms of the lease granted to defendant 1. The land was not actually resumed, but a renewed lease was granted to defendant 1 in 1907. The effect of this has been held by the Subordinate Judge not to have interfered with the rights of Kalachand under the permanent lease granted to him by defendant 1. This has not been controverted by the District Judge on appeal. The position, therefore, appears to be this: that Kalachand continued to remain a lessee under the permanent lease granted to him by defendant 1. Then in 1908 defendant 1 granted a lease to defendants 2 and 3 of a certain area of land which is said to have comprised the lands which had previously been demised to Kalachand. This piece of land was also described as virgin jungle. It has been found that defendants 2 and 3 cleared the jungle and brought the land under cultivation and then sold their interest to defendants 4 and 5. The plaintiff claims under a purchase from Kalachand in 1910 and sues for possession.

The plaintiff alleged that he had been dispossessed in 1914. The question is whether his title has been lost by dispossession in discontinuance of possession on the date of the suit, as the finding is that he has not proved dispossession in 1914 as alleged.

The suit was originally filed in the Court of the Munsif at Diamond Harbour on 10th June 1918, and the plaint was returned for presentation to the proper Court on a finding that the value of the property was in excess of the jurisdiction of the Munsif on 30th July 1919. The plaint was filed again in the Court of the Subordinate Judge on 6th August 1919. The important point, therefore, is whether the plaintiff has been dispossessed for more than 12 years prior to the date of the suit. On the finding, as I understand the decision of the learned Judge, the land was admittedly virgin forest at any rate up to 1908. Before 1908 nobody had claimed any title to the land in suit except the plaintiff's vendor Kalachand, and as it was virgin jungle up to 1908 when it was leased out to defendants 2 and 3 it cannot be said that the plaintiff's vendor was dispossessed by any person. Unless a person comes into possession of a piece of land holding adversely to the true owner it cannot be said that the true owner has been dispossessed. This principle seems to me to be obvious and may be deduced from the well-known case of Trustees, Executors and Agency Co., Ltd.

(1) A. I. R. 1922 Cal. 557=26 C. W. N. 724;

v Short (2), which has been followed in the case of Secretary of State v. Krishnamani Gupta (3) and in other cases in this Court. This proposition may also find support in the cases of Kuthali Moothawar v. Peringali Kunharankutty (4) and Kumar Basant Roy v. Secretary of State (5). In my opinion, therefore, the plaintiffs were in the eye of law in the possession of the land in dispute and had not been dispossessed at any time prior to 1908 when the lease was granted by defendant 1 to defendants 2 and 3. The case of Rakhal Chandra Ghose v. Durgadas Samanta (1) in no way goes against that view. In that case evidence was given by both parties as regards actual acts of possession. What was observed at p. 736 of the report is this :

Now, where definite evidence of acts of possession is forthcoming there is no difference between the proof of possession in the case of jungle, waste or uncultivated lands and in that of cultivated lands. But whereas in the case of cultivated lands the plaintiff will fail if he does not prove his possession within 12 years, in the case of jungle or waste land, if he proves his title, there is a presumption in his favour where, having regard to the nature of the land, possession cannot be expected to be proved by acts of actual user and enjoyment. If, however, the plaintiff asserts that he exercised acts of ownership upon the land and adduces evidence in support of such assertion he cannot, where such evidence is disbelieved by the Court, turn round and rely upon any presumption.

Here there is no question of any such presumption upon which the plaintiff has to rely. The question depends upon the facts found that there was no person before 1908 who exercised any act of possession on the land in dispute as against the plaintiff. When there was no one who intruded on the land before 1908, plaintiff's vendor's possession cannot be said to have been disturbed. I am therefore of opinion that the decision of the learned Judge should be reversed and the appeal allowed. But I would order that the case should be sent back for the purpose of a local investigation in order to ascertain exactly the land which falls within the lease of the plaintiff. An application was made by the plaintiff before the Subordinate Judge for holding a local investigation. But that was disallowed on what seems to be insufficient grounds as he held that the land could be ascertained upon oral evidence. On appeal the learned Judge was of opinion that the land could not be ascertained on oral evidence. The only course he then ought to have taken was either to order a local investigation himself or to direct the lower Court to make a local investigation and send him the result of such investigation in order to arrive at a decision on the question whether the land in the possession of defendants 1 and 2 fell within the lease of the plaintiff.

If the case had to be sent back I would also direct an enquiry, if the plaintiff succeeds in establishing the identity of the land in suit, as to the terms on which the plaintiff would be allowed a decree for possession having regard to the fact that apparently the defendants spent a considerable sum of money in order to improve the land. That matter has not been investigated in either of the Courts below. It is alleged that the question of compensation was not argued before the trial Court, because the defendants alleged that they would have their compensation from their landlord. This is also one of the questions which the Court would have to go into if the case went back for trial according to my view. On behalf of the respondents a question was raised that the document on which the plaintiff relies was not legally registered, But that question does not appear to have been debated in the lower appellate Court. I need not discuss these questions as the appeal will be dismissed in accordance with the opinion of my learned brother.

Judgment

Rankin, C. J.—This is an appeal under S. 15, Letters Patent, arising from a difference of opinion between my learned brothers Mr. Justice Cuming and Mr. Justice B. B. Ghose.

The suit was brought in August 1919 and the question before us is a question of limitation under Art. 142, Sch. 1, Limitation Act. The facts upon which the matter depends have reference to the grant of a reclamation lease of certain land held under Government in the Sunderbuns. It appears that defendant 1 obtained from Government a head lease on 26th July 1900. By the terms of that lease he was under obligation to see that steps were taken to bring part of the jungle land comprised therein into cultivation upon certain terms and conditions which I need not now specifically refer to. Defendant 1 gave a permanent lease of 100 bighas out of his land to one Kalachand in 1901. Kalachand, it appears, took no steps at all to reclaim the land, but it is matter which the Court of first instance decided and on which, in my judgment, there is no contrary finding by the District Judge, that that lease given to Kalachand was a reality, that is to say it was not a transaction which the parties thereto never intended to have any effect. It was not entered into merely for the purpose of some convenient or fraudulent design, but was a reality in the sense that one party paid his money and the other party intended to part with his rights under the lease. Kalachand having got his lease took no steps to reclaim the 100 bighas of jungle which he had in that way acquired and in that sense it may be said that the matter got no further than the paper transaction by which he took a title to the 100 bighas.

The next point is this that the Government being dissatisfied with the progress as regards reclamation took steps by which they called upon defendant 1 to give up the land or at least to take a new lease on more stringent conditions. In point of fact a new lease on more stringent conditions was granted to defendant 1, the actual land itself not being resumed or interfered with. This was in 1907.

The first question which arises is whether the cancellation of the original head lease and grant of the new lease put an end altogether to Kalachand's title. If that be so, it is an end of the suit. As Mr Justice B B Ghose said :

The effect of this has been held by the Subordinate Judge not to have interfered with the rights of Kalachand under the permanent lease granted to him by defendant 1. This has not been controverted by the District Judge on appeal.

In my judgment it is necessary to take it for the purpose of the present case that the under-lease granted to Kalachand did not come to an end by reason of the transaction between defendant 1 and the Government in 1907.

Kalachand having taken no steps to comply with the requirements either under the under-lease or the head lease, defendant 1 gave leases to defendants 2 and 3 on 18th November 1908. On 2nd

November 1917 defendant 3 and later on defendant 2 parted with their interest to defendants 4 and 5, but it was in 1908 that the title under which the defendants claim came first into existence. In 1911 Kalachand sold his interest to the plaintiff and the plaintiff brought his suit in August 1919.

Now, the questions upon which the learned Judges have differed are really two. The first question is whether or not it is open to the plaintiff to say that he has shown in this case, first that he has a title to this land, and, secondly, that prior to 1908 no one had interfered with it by any acts of possession contrary to his right.

The second question is whether that contention, if the plaintiff makes it good, will enable him to escape the effect of Art. 142, Sec. 1, Limitation Act. Mr. Justice Cuming took the view that as the plaintiff had come into Court with an allegation that Kalachand and his people had possession in the fullest sense of the word actively, clearing the land living on it, the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to make a case that up to 1908, when defendants 2 and 3 came on the land no one was in actual possession at all. He was also of opinion that that case would not be a good case under Art. 142.

The main question is whether that contention if proved is a good answer to Art. 142. In my opinion it is. In my opinion if the plaintiff shows that at a time when the right to possession of the land was with him it was jungle land, and no one else was in possession of it or interfering with it in any way contrary to his right, then he has done what is necessary to show that he was in the eye of the law in possession at the time. There is only one rule of law, but in its application there is some difference between land which is ready for use or cultivation, land which is under water and incapable of any use, and land such as jungle land. The plaintiff has always to show that he was in possession within 12 years of suit and it will not do for him to show that within 13 or 14 years before suit he was in possession of the land. But in the case of land which cannot be availed of at all, it is clear law that the plaintiff may show that he was in possession 14 years before suit, that the land was flooded over with water, was incapable of any further use, and that his possession accordingly remained down to within 12 years of the suit because no disturbance of his possession can in these circumstances be supposed. So too with jungle land such as this. It is in my judgment quite true to say that it is not enough for the plaintiff to prove his title. It is quite true to say that it is not enough for him to show that 13 or 14 years before suit he was in possession. But he can make a case by showing as an additional fact either that the land in question was incapable of possession by anyone or that in fact no one was interfering with his right. It is possession not user, that has to be shown.

In this case the defendants' case is that when they took the land in November 1908, it was an unreclaimed jungle; that Kalachand was not in possession and no one was in possession. If it be true that the plaintiff's predecessor-in-title, Kalachand, had a real interest which was still subsisting, and with which no one was purporting to interfere, then it seems to me that for the period before 1908 the plaintiff has shown that Kalachand was in possession. I am of opinion that the contention which found favour with Mr. Justice B. B. Ghose is correct, and that the cases cited in his judgment establish the proposition which he affirms. Another authority is the case of Suresh Chandra Mukherji v. Shitl Kanta Bannerji (6). Both in the judgment of Mr. Justice Woodroffe and in the judgment of Mr. Justice B. B. Ghose the law is so laid down and it appears to be consistent with first principles laid down by the highest authority.

The next question is whether in the circumstances of this case the plaintiff ought to be allowed to say that this land before 1908 was in the actual occupation of no one. I may observe here that there is no case of abandonment raised or proved to the satisfaction of either of the Courts below. I need hardly say that for the purpose of inferring abandonment the nature and character of the land are extremely important. What is said is that as the plaintiff came to Court with a case that Kalachand was clearing and living on this jungle before 1908, he ought not to be allowed now to fall back upon the proposition that nobody was living on the land at all. The chief authority for that contention on the part of the respondents is the decision in the case of Bir-khal Chandra Ghose v. Durgadas Samanta (1). Now, whether the plaintiff should be allowed to change his case or to fall back upon an alternative case depends upon the circumstances, upon the points at issue and the way in which he has pleaded. This is not one of those cases where it is perfectly certain that either the plaintiff or the defendant was in active possession. If you get land on the border of two estates it may be perfectly certain that one or other of the two proprietors used it sometimes. If the plaintiff adduces evidence that he was in the habit of using it, and defendants adduce evidence that it was always used by them and the plaintiff's evidence is disbelieved, it may be a strange thing to allow the plaintiff to fall back upon the supposition that nobody was using it at all contrary to the case of both the parties. But here the defendants' own admissions have to be looked to and the surrounding circumstances have to be looked to. In allowing the plaintiff to proceed upon the basis that no one was in active possession of this land in 1908 one is doing no more than giving the plaintiff the benefit of the case which the defendants from the first made. I think that this is a matter in the Court's discretion, and that it would be wrong to shut the plaintiff out from putting his case on the established facts. It has been contended that the defendants might have proved that Government actually resumed the land in 1907, but if they had any such evidence it would have been adduced to disprove the plaintiff's title.

For these reasons it appears to me that this appeal should be allowed. I am entirely in agreement with the judgment of Mr. Justice B. B. Ghose in regard to two further matters. One is that the case should be sent back in order that proper steps may be taken to have a local enquiry made to show whether this land can be identified or not. If it turns out that the plaintiff cannot succeed in proving that the defendants are in occupation of his land then no doubt the plaintiff's suit will fail. If, however, he succeeds in identifying the lands with those in possession of defendants, then there should be an enquiry as to the terms upon which the plaintiff should be given a decree for possession. He bought this property in 1911, when the defendants were spending money on it. In considering this matter it is not necessary for us to lay down in advance any general propositions for the Court below, but it will be for that Court to consider whether the defendants are not entitled to compensation amounting to a full indemnity for the money which has been expended in improving the land and perhaps even in respect of interest thereon. The case must go back to the trial Court on these points. I think this appeal should be allowed with costs and that the appellant should have the costs of the second appeal in this Court. There should be no costs of the appeal before the District Judge. As regards the trial Court the costs of the whole suit will be dealt with by that Court after dealing with the case upon this remand. The decree of the trial Court is set aside and the case remanded as above mentioned.

C. C. Ghose, J—This is in an appeal from an order made by my learned brother Mr Justice Pearson on 6th December 1926 on an application made by the plaintiff Company under Ch 13A of the Rules of this Court for summary judgment.

The facts, shortly stated, are as follows. The defendant Shyam Sundar Chakravarty, who is the appellant before us, was on all material dates the Editor of the "Servant" newspaper and Managing Director of the defendant Company, namely, the Servant Publishing Company Limited. It appears that the plaintiff Company supplied paper from time to time for the use of the defendant Company and as and when the goods were delivered, the appellant Shyam Sundar Chakravarty executed certain promissory-notes for the value thereof. The promissory-notes were eight in number. The plaintiff Company made attempts to realize the moneys due but did not succeed. There was on the date of the application a sum of Rs. 8,910-2-6 due to the plaintiff Company for principal and a sum of Rs. 463-4-4 on account of interest. The promissory-notes were all alike and one of them, which is printed at p 1 of the paper-book, may be quoted herein as a sample :

On demand I, Shyam Sundar Chakravarty Esq., Editor and Managing Director, "The Servant," promise to pay the Titaghar Paper Mills Co. Ltd., or order the sum of rupees nine hundred and twenty-two and annas four only together with interest thereon at the rate of twelve per cent per annum from the tenth February 1925, being the value of one hundred and thirty-six reams of paper sold and delivered to me from their go own as per their delivery order No. 1-188."

The appellant filed an affidavit in answer to the application of the plaintiff Company in which he contended that he did not sign the said promissory-notes in his personal capacity in consideration of the paper being supplied to the defendant Company and that, under the circumstances, the Servant Publishing Company Ltd. were alone liable for the price of the paper supplied and that there wa

no personal liability undertaken by the appellant. The matter came on before my learned brother, Mr Justice Pearson, on 6th December 1926, when he made an order in terms of the plaintiff Company's summons for summary judgment. He held that, having regard to the terms of the promissory-notes, it could not be contended that the appellant had not undertaken any personal liability in respect of the sums mentioned in the said promissory-notes.

On appeal it is argued on behalf of the appellant by Mr. S C Roy, firstly, that there was a triable issue raised by the appellant and that no summary judgment should have been passed; and, in the second place, that on the construction of the promissory-notes themselves there was no personal liability undertaken by the appellant and that, therefore, no decree should have been made against him.

As regards the first point: it is sufficient to observe that, on the materials before us, it is clear that there was no triable issue dependent on facts which were to be investigated, but there was a question of law raised by the appellant, namely, whether, having regard to the terms of the promissory notes any personal liability had been undertaken by the appellant. That question did not in my opinion involve the taking of evidence. It was a pure question of law and had to be decided with reference to the terms of the promissory-notes. On the decision of that question depended as to whether there should be a summary judgment in favour of the plaintiff Company or whether leave to defend the suit should be given to the appellant. Mr Justice Pearson held on the construction of the promissory-notes that the appellant had undertaken a personal liability and passed summary judgment in favour of the plaintiff Company. That amounted to saying that, in the circumstances disclosed no leave should be given to the defendant to put in a defence in the ordinary way. That disposed of the first point raised by Mr Roy.

As regards the second point: it is sufficient to observe that, having regard to the cases, some of which are referred to in my judgment In the matter of Jagodia Cotton Mills Ltd. (1), it cannot be contended on the documents in this case that the appellant had not undertaken and did not undertake any personal liability. The appellant's description as Managing Director in the body of the promissory-notes had not the effect of excluding his personal liability. It is noteworthy that the appellant, when he put his signature on the promissory-notes, signed his name without any qualification whatsoever and did not take any steps whatsoever to indicate that he was signing the document not in his personal capacity, but for and on behalf of the Servant Publishing Company Ltd, and as their Managing Director. Under these circumstances, there could only have been one answer to the question raised by the appellant, and in my opinion Mr. Justice Pearson rightly negatived the contention raised by the appellant.

Mr Roy has drawn our attention to the case of Elliott v Bax-Ironside (2). That case, as I read it, is entirely against Mr Roy's contention. What happened in that case is this: The action was against two defendants as indorsers of a bill of exchange. Those defendants were the Directors of a Company called the Fashions Fair Exhibitions Ltd, and one of the defendants was a person named Mason who was the Managing Director. The Company accepted two bills of exchange for £1000 each, but inasmuch as the capital of the Company was not more than £400 it was suggested that the two bills of exchange should be indorsed by the two Directors, namely Sir Henry Bax-Ironside and Mr R A Mason. They accordingly indorsed the two bills of exchange, and the contention that was sought to be canvassed on their behalf before the Judge in the Court of first instance and in the court of appeal was that they had not accepted any personal liability. It was held that having regard to the facts that, although they had described themselves as Directors, they were really guaranteeing a debt due by the Fashions Fair Exhibitions Ltd, and that they accordingly could not avoid liability as guarantors. But on law and on facts, this case, as I read it, is against the contention put forward before us by Mr Roy.

On all these grounds I am of opinion that this appeal should stand dismissed with costs.

Roy, J.—This appeal arises out of a mortgage suit dismissed by the Subordinate Judge of Maldah. The plaintiff Gulzar Mondal (who died subsequently) and his cousins Sabektulla (the predecessors-in-interest of defendants 4, 5 and 6) and Sariatulla (the predecessor of defendants 7, 8, 9 and 10) lived in joint mess and had joint properties including a money-lending business which was carried on at several places. According to the plaint Sariat was the sole karta or manager till his death which happened in Baisakh 1315 B. E. After his death his son, defendant 4, was selected as the karta "as he was smart and intelligent". It appears that he was the karta at Rahanpur. The principal defendants 1 and 2 used to borrow money from the Mondal family. In 1313 B. E. they executed a mortgage-deed called a karbarnama in favour of Sariat as security for the loans up to a certain amount. After Sariat's death defendants 1 and 2 executed on 5th Magh 1315, corresponding to 14th January 1909, a fresh karbarnama in favour of Gulzar (who was in charge of the money-lending business at Biswanathpur, the family seat) and defendant 4. They were to borrow to the limit of Rs. 5,000 and pay interest at 1½ per cent. per mensem with annual rests. The actual transactions were to be entered in a dastabij and the stipulation was that no transaction not entered therein would be taken into consideration. It appears that immediately before Sariat's death, when he was ill, the business at Rahanpur was placed in charge of a relative, Sahimaddi Munshi.

Defendant 4 thought he was making misappropriation and dismissed him. Dissensions started among the family and there were civil and criminal cases in which different members seem to have taken different sides. It is not clear when the business at Rahanpur came to an end. On the last day of limitation Gulzar commenced this action for his share of the mortgage-debt, viz., one-third. It was stated that the karbarnama and other papers were in the custody of defendant 4. Gulzar claimed his share of the mortgage-debt from defendants 1 and 2 and there was an alternative prayer that if they had paid up and there was a valid discharge, a decree might be passed against defendant 4. Defendants 3 and 3-A were joined as being purchasers of a portion of the mortgaged properties. The heirs of Sabektulla and Sariatulla were also joined and an option was given to them to join Gulzar as co-plaintiffs. The daughters of Sabektulla and Sariatulla, viz., defendants 6, 7 and 8, on their prayer, were transferred to the category of the plaintiffs and apparently accepted the statements in the plaint. Defendants 1 and 2, i.e., the principal defendants and defendant 4, the manager at Rahanpur, resisted the suit and their defence in short was that there had been an adjustment of accounts and the debt was paid up by defendants 1 and 2, who got back the karbarnama from defendant 4 and also a receipt from him. The dastabij which was to be a record of the transactions between the Mondals and the principal defendants is not forthcoming. The case for the plaintiffs was that it was with defendant 4; the defence was that it was sent to the Biswanapur along with other papers and received by Gulzar. In the absence of the dastabij the plaintiffs relied on the money advanced in 1906 in the time of Sariat and a hisab said to have been made up on 10th Magh, 1315 B. E. and a subsequent letter of acknowledgment. The question as to how much was actually advanced lost its importance on the plea set up. The learned Subordinate Judge held that defendants 1 and 2 had got a valid discharge from defendant 4 and that the latter could not be made liable without bringing a suit for accounts and in this view of the case he dismissed the suit. The plaintiffs have appealed.

The learned vakil appearing for the plaintiffs-appellants grounds his claim on the argument that one joint mortgagee cannot give a full discharge when there are joint mortgagees. The case of Abdul Hakim v. Adyata Chandra Das (1) was quoted for the principle, that payment to one of several joint creditors does not necessarily operate as a discharge of the debts in so far as the other creditors are concerned. The principle was affirmed in the case of Satindra Nath Choudhury v. Jatindra Nath Choudhury (2). The principle is not applicable to the facts of the present case. The payment here was to a joint mortgagee, but he was also a person who was the manager and agent of all the Mondals. The question really is whether he could take the money on behalf of all the cosharers. Defendants 1 and 2 had a running account. They were to take loans which were to be entered in a dastabij kept by defendant 4 and he was to receive the payments. Defendant 4 is described as the manager and agent of the Mondals at Rahanpur in the plaint and the statement is repeated in the plaint more than once. It was urged that defendant 4 worked under Gulzar's control and for this argument reliance is placed on the written statement of defendant 1, that when the debt was paid up a remission was made with the consent of Gulzar. Defendant 4 made this statement to show that Gulzar was aware of the payment of the debt. It is quite conceivable that Gulzar was consulted. It would be natural for defendant 4 to do this, but the argument that defendant 4 acted under Gulzar and had no authority beyond a certain point is against the plaint.

The learned vakil contended that there was collusion between the contesting defendants. He referred to the evidence given by defendant 1 in a criminal case, on 8th April 1910, wherein he said he had paid up Sariat's loan, but he also asserted that he had taken a fresh loan and he admitted the agreement or karbarnama. The learned vakil then referred to a letter from one of the defendants which goes to show that the contesting defendants consulted together before filing the respective defence. It appears that the Court below allowed the defendants about a year to file their written statements. It is to be regretted that the Court was so lax in this matter, but people may consult each other when they happen to be in the same box. During the stress of arguments the learned vakil advanced the theory that no payment had been made and that the endorsement of payment was made on the karbarnama after the suit was filed. The suit, as I have said, was filed on the last day of limitation. It is inconceivable why Masinaddin (defendant 4) should not realize anything from defendants 1 and 2 during the 12 years. In the Court below, it would appear that the suggestion was, that the payment was made not in 1317, but in 1318 B E and that was done by defendants 1 and 2 transferring certain properties to defendant 4. The allegation that there was collusion does not rise beyond mere suspicion. Even if there was any collusion defendants 1 and 2 cannot be held liable. They have paid up to the manager and agent and they have got back their mortgage-deed fully satisfied. They have obtained a valid discharge.

It was argued that there was litigation between the different members of the Mondal family and that if defendants 1 and 2 paid up at that time to one member they did so at their peril. It appears that Sariat's daughters thought that they were being deprived of their share in the business and they started litigation. Gulzar at that time was on the side of defendant 4. It appears that the police came and locked up the Rahanpur gaddi, but this was only for a brief period. The police returned the keys and the business was resumed. Gulzar himself filed an affidavit so late as 17th July 1911, and said so, though he alleged that they had started a fresh business after the dismissal of Sahimaddin. Defendant 4 remained the manager at Rahanpur and nothing was done to remove him from the position of manager which was originally assigned to him. In this connexion it may be mentioned that Sariat's daughters subsequently filed an account suit (viz on 24th April 1911) against both defendant 4 and Gulzar for accounts from Baisakh 1315 B. E. to Aswin 1316 B. E. and the decree, Ex. I, was obtained only against defendant 4. The debt under discussion does not seem to have formed the subject-matter of that suit. Sariat's daughters may not have been aware of it. They did not challenge the position of defendant 4, but wanted accounts from him. Defendant 4 continued to be the manager till July 1911 and for some time after. Evidence was given by a son-in-law of Khatija (one of the daughters of Sariat) that he warned the principal defendants not to pay to one co-sharer, but, as the learned Subordinate Judge points out, it cannot be believed that he would give a warning in 1316 B. E. when he did not marry into the family till two years after. The finding of the learned Subordinate Judge that defendants 1 and 2 got a valid discharge appears to be unassailable.

There remains the question whether there can be a decree against defendant 4 in this suit. The learned Subordinate Judge says, and we think very properly, that the plaintiffs should have brought an account suit. The learned vakil states that the time has gone and he refers to the fact that defendant 4 and Gulzar have realized their shares by bringing suits on certain bonds. The decrees have been filed, but we are not in a position to know under what circumstances the decrees were achieved. It seems difficult to believe that the parties never discussed among themselves the present debt. It is the fault of the plaintiffs that they have delayed so long in bringing this action and other remedies are barred. The position being that defendant 4 was the manager and karta of the Rahanpur gaddi, and it being common ground that money passed between Rahanpur and the principal gaddi, the plaintiffs cannot succeed except by an adjustment of accounts in properly framed account suit. We, therefore, agree with the conclusions arrived at by the Court below. The appeal is dismissed with costs. There will be two sets of costs, one set for defendants 1 and 2 and another for defendant 4.

Appeals Nos. 84 and 85 of 1925, Decided on 22nd July 1927, from appellate decrees of 2nd Sub-Judge, Sylhet, D/-23rd May 1924

Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, Sch. 2, Art. 29—Suit by a partner after the dissolution of the partnership must be for general account—Maintainability of a suit between partners without taking accounts depends upon circumstances of each case.

The general rule of law is that a suit by a partner after the dissolution of the partnership must be for a general account unless special circumstances exist which entitle one partner to bring a suit against another or others for a particular item. But if the suit relates to the loss and profits of the partnership business or to the stock-in-trade or capital employed in the business in respect of which all partners have equal rights, it must be one for a general account of the partnership business. The maintainability of a suit between partners without taking a general account of all the partnership dealings of transaction must depend upon circumstances of each case and upon whether justice can really be done without taking such account. [P 128 C 2]

A person cannot bring a suit for a specific sum without a general suit for accounts for the purpose of ascertaining if he is entitled to a share in the assets of the firm.

A dispute between partners whose business has come to an end regarding the division of the assets can only be finally settled in a proper suit for adjustment of accounts, and it is not proper that each of the parties should proceed by separate suits in order to recover from the others any sums due to the partnership business which they may have realized.

A suit for specific sum of money cannot be converted into a suit for accounts.

A suit for recovery of specific sum of money does not assume the character of a suit for accounts merely because in the determination of the question in controversy accounts may have to be examined. 26 Cal. 254; 27 C.L.J. 96 and 28 Mad. 391, Foll.. 17 C.W. Judgment—The plaintiff and defendants 6 to 8 in the first suit, who are defendants 2 to 4 in the second suit, were partners in a business. They fell out and the present suits were brought by the plaintiff. The first suit which we will call the money suit was for recovery of a sum of money, being one-third share of the plaintiff in certain ornaments and cash which were in the iron safe of the firm and were wrongly taken away by the defendants. Her case against defendant 1 was that he, in collusion with the partners, misappropriated the ornaments and cash taken out of the iron safe. There were four more defendants, the neighbouring shop-keepers, who were said to have helped the other defendants in the taking out of the money and articles. The defence was that the plaintiff's brother Bama Charan was at one time acting as the manager of the firm and he was dismissed because of his defalcations, and defendant 1 was requested by the other partners to help them in the payment of creditors and for that purpose money was taken out of the safe and applied in the payment of the debts of the firm. As regards the ornaments, the defendants were willing to produce them in Court and to abide by the order of the Court with regard to their disposal. The Munsif who tried the case found that the defendant's version of the story was true and the suit for money was dismissed and it was decreed in respect of the one-third share of the plaintiff in the ornaments. The lower appellate Court upheld the decree of the trial Court and hence this appeal by the plaintiff. At the hearing the suit was withdrawn as against defendants 6 to 8 (partners) who were dismissed from the suit. On the findings of the trial Court which were endorsed by the lower appellate Court we do not think that there is any question in this case which entitles us to interfere with the decree. The finding is that defendant 1 who is a highly respectable man under the authority of the other partners took out the money and paid the debts of the firm with great advantage to the firm, the debts being paid off at 55 per cent. That there was no misappropriation by defendant 1 and that the present suit was instituted apparently at the instigation of Bama Charan, the brother of the plaintiff. On these findings no question of law arises and the suit was rightly dismissed. Appeal No. 84 is dismissed with costs.

The other suit which may be called the title suit was brought by the plaintiff for recovery of one-third share in the sale proceeds of the stock-in-trade. Defendant 1 is Brojendra Lal Das Chowdhury, who was defendant 1 in the other suit, and his defence is that he acted bona fide under instructions from the other partners. On the findings there can be no question that the suit was rightly dismissed against him.

As regards the claim against the partners the Munsif found that the amount of debt paid off by the other partners far exceeded the value of the stock-in-trade as put by the plaintiff. He also held that the suit was not maintainable without a general suit for accounts as between partners. In this view the suit was dismissed. The Subordinate Judge in appeal did not discuss the merits of the case, but dismissed the appeal on the ground that the suit in the form against the partners was not maintainable. The learned vakil for the appellant argues that the view of the lower appellate Court on law is wrong as the suit was maintainable. There can be no question that the general rule of law is that a suit by a partner after the dissolution of the partnership must be for a general account unless special circumstances exist which entitle one partner to bring a suit against another or others for a particular item. But if the suit relates to the loss and profits of the partnership business or to the stock-in-trade or capital employed in the business in respect of which all partners have equal rights, it must be one for a general account of the partnership business. But maintains the learned vakil for the appellant that an action for a specific sum, as for the price of the plaintiff's share in the sale proceeds of the stock-in-trade, is maintainable without a suit for accounts. He also contends that if in order to give proper relief it, is necessary to take accounts from the defendants the Court should take such accounts.

With reference to the second branch of the argument it may be said that the first Court did go into the question and found that the other partners used the proceeds of the sale of the stock-in-trade in paying off the debts and they will not, therefore, be liable. As to the first contention our attention has been drawn to the decision in the case of Durga Prosonno Bose v. Raghu Nath Dass (1). In that case one partner under arrangement amongst the partners borrowed a sum of money and put it into the partnership till. Subsequently the creditor by a suit against that partner realized the amount. Thereupon the partner sued his other partners for contribution of the money which he had to pay under the decree of his creditor. The learned Judges held that such a suit was maintainable without a general suit for accounts on the ground that the money secured by the promissory note for which the suit was brought against the plaintiff did not become an item of the partnership accounts. On the facts of that particular case the decision seems to be perfectly justifiable. One partner had to contribute to the capital of the firm out of which profit was received by all the partners in equal shares, and if that partner had to pay the money which he had so employed in the partnership business, there does not seem to be any reason why he could not recover by way of contribution the share of the debt payable by the other partners. The suit had nothing to do with the partnership business or with reference to the assets of the partnership. The learned Judges in that case went thoroughly into the law as to the rights of partners amongst themselves. But on the facts of that particular case it was evident that the general rule, that a suit between partners relating to the partnership business must be a suit for general accounts of the dissolution, did not apply. Moreover, the rule has been stated in Lindley on Partnership, 9th edition, p 663 in answer to a question formulated by the learned author:

When can an action be maintained between partners without taking a general account, of all the partnership dealings and transactions;

This question, according to the learned author, can only be answered generally by saying that each case must depend upon its own circumstances and upon whether justice can really be done without taking such account.

In the present case it must be admitted that the plaintiff cannot sue for a specific sum without calling upon the other partners to show how the price of the stock-in-trade was applied by them, in other words, she cannot bring a suit for a specific sum without a general suit for accounts for the purpose of ascertaining if she is entitled to a share in the assets of the firm. In Ram Chandra Pal v. Krishna Lal Pal (2), a suit was brought in the Small Causes Court by one of the partners for a sum of money alleged to be due by the other partners. The question before the Court was whether the suit was maintainable in the Court of Small Causes. The learned Judges held that a dispute between partners, whose business has come to an end regarding the division of the assets, can only be finally settled in a proper suit for adjustment of accounts; and it is not proper that each of the parties should proceed by separate suits in order to recover from the others any sum due to the partnership business which they may have realized. We have also been referred to the case of K Venkata Reddi v. K. Narasayya (3), but we do not see what bearing that case has on the facts of the present case. There, under the terms of the contracts between the partners, the working partner was to make over all the cheques and moneys received by him to the capitalist partner. He had omitted to do so and a suit was brought by the partner supplying the capital for the recovery of the cheques. It was held that a suit did lie. There is no special contract in this case and in our opinion the general law must prevail, namely, that the plaintiff cannot maintain a suit for her share in the assets of the partnership without bringing a suit for a general account.

We further do not think that in the present case it was the duty of the Court to take accounts from the defendants and give proper relief to the plaintiff. As has been held in Kshetranath Banerjee v. Kalidasi Das (4), a suit for recovery of a specific sum of money does not assume the character of a suit for accounts merely because in the determination of the question in controversy accounts may have to be examined. Though the question before the Court then was whether the suit was maintainable in the Small Causes Court the general principle that a suit for a specific sum of money cannot be converted into a suit for accounts is sound. To the same effect is the case of K. Runga Reddi v. Subbiah Setty (5) in which it is stated that a suit for an account is a special form of suit in which a special process is required for the purpose of taking accounts and that every case in which accounts have to be looked into to ascertain the amount due to the plaintiff cannot be said to be a suit for accounts. In our judgment the suit, as brought by the plaintiff, is not maintainable and the plaintiff is entitled to no relief. It would not have been necessary, on the findings of fact arrived at by the trial Court, to go into the question of law but for the extremely unsatisfactory judgment of the lower appellate Court which gave sufficient indication that the learned Subordinate Judge did not fulfil his function as presiding over the appellate Court. This appeal is accordingly dismissed with separate costs to respondent 1 and to respondents 2 to 4.

(a) Mahomedan Law — Wakf made prior to 1913 — Illusory bequest to charity—Real object to benefit settlor's family — Wakf is not valid nor is made void by Mussalman Wakf Validating Act (6 of 1913).

In order to perpetuate the names of his ancestors, and to keep the properties intact for ever, a Mahomedan made wakf in 1869 of all his properties for the benefit of his children, etc., how ever soever; and in their absence, of the poor cousins and relatives, mendicants, people destitute of all means, widows and orphans for all time. Out of the income of Rs. 10,000 the settler had set apart Rs. 456 per year for charities. Some of the descendants sued for partition of the properties in 1922.

Held: that the provisions for the benefit of the settler's family were invalid as constituting wakf under the Mahomedan law and they could not be validated by the Mussalman Wakf Validating Act, 1913, which is not retrospective, and that the gift to charity was so small in comparison with the income of the property that the gift for charities might very well be considered to be quite illusory: 17 Cal. 498 (P. Having come into possession under one title, he cannot improve his position by asserting that that title was non-existent, but he held under some adverse right which extinguished the title of the beneficiaries under the deed by virtue of which he entered into possession.

So you may get your shares if you like and I am willing to part with the possession of the properties as mutwalli in your favour." [P 134 C 2]

(g) Document—Construction — Intention of maker must be found from expressions used—If two constructions possible, one making deed valid should be accepted.

The true rule of construction of deeds is to find out the intention of the testator or settlor from the expressions used in the document itself, and then to apply the law as to whether the intention so expressed is valid or not. If, however, it so happens that it is possible to construe a document in two different ways the Court may accept the construction which would make it valid. [P 132 C 2]

Sarat Chandra Basak and Syed Nasim Ali, Brendra Kumar De and Benoyendra Nath Palit—for Respondents.

B. B. Ghose, J.—These two appeals arise out of a single suit for partition which has been dismissed by the learned Subordinate Judge Appeal 175 of 1923 is by defendants 4 and 14 to 17. The contesting respondents are defendants 1, 8, 11, 18, 34 and 66. The representatives of defendants 13 and 27, as well as defendant 26, appear in this Court by their guardian ad litem, the Deputy Registrar. These respondents support the appeal made by the appellants. Appeal 261 of 1925 is by the plaintiff. Defendant 1, who appears as one of the respondents, resists this appeal. There is one common ground between the two appeals, and there are certain different grounds in the appeal preferred by the plaintiff which will be dealt with separately. The property in question originally belonged to the ancestor of the parties, a gentleman named Syed Bakht Majumdar. He created a wakf of some of his properties by a deed, dated the 28th August 1867.

The plaintiff asked for partition of the properties comprised in that document in her plaint, and the defendants, who are appellants in appeal 175 of 1925, and the other defendants who also support the plaintiff's suit for partition, also asked for partition of those properties. In the appeal, however, the claim for partition with regard to those properties is given up by both sets of appellants, and it is conceded that a valid wakf was created by that deed with regard to the properties included in it. The dispute now is with regard to the question whether the other properties included in the plaint, both moveable and immovable, are capable of being partitioned. The Subordinate Judge has dismissed the suit mainly upon the ground that the immovable properties were constituted a valid wakf by Syed Bakht Majumdar, by a deed, dated the 6th April 1869, which is Ex 5 in the suit. That being so, these properties are not liable to be partitioned. The Subordinate Judge further found that the claim of the plaintiff was barred by the rule of res judicata and the plaintiff was also estopped from questioning the validity of the wakf on account of certain transactions which will be stated later on. The Subordinate Judge, however, did not give any reason for dismissing the claim for partition of the moveables. Two other points were raised before us on behalf of the contesting respondents which were not decided by the Subordinate Judge. The first point was that the suit of the plaintiff was barred by limitation and the second was that the Court had no jurisdiction to direct the partition having regard to S. 154 (1) (e), Assam Land and Revenue Regulation.

I shall first deal with Appeal 175 preferred by the defendants. Their case is that they are entitled to certain shares in the properties as the heirs of the original owner, Syed Bakht Majumdar. The dismissal of the plaintiff's suit has affected their right to partition and so they are entitled to present the appeal against the judgment of the Subordinate Judge and to have it declared that the property is liable to be partitioned and to have their shares ascertained. The most important question in this case is with regard to the validity of the wakfnama, dated the 6th April 1869, Ex. 5. I do not think it is necessary to recite the contents of the document in detail. I think it will be quite sufficient to give the important provisions of the deed. These are as follows :

In order to perpetuate the names of my ancestors and to keep the properties intact for ever, I, with full reliance on God, do hereby make wakf of all my properties, etc. for the benefit of my children, etc. how low so ever, and in their absence, of the poor kinsmen and relatives, mendicants, people destitute of all means, widows and orphans for all time to come etc. etc.

Para. 3.—That so long as I shall be alive, the family expenses and the allowances, etc., of the beneficiaries shall be what I have mentioned today in the list which I have made over to the mutwalli, and the amounts mentioned therein shall remain fixed, or the same may be varied in future, if I think fit.

It is then provided that, after defraying all these expenses, the surplus income shall be deposited in the tahabil of the wakf; and it is further provided that with that surplus income other properties should be purchased.

Para. 7.—That properties would be purchased for all the beneficiaries under the wakf out of the money which would remain as surplus after paying the monthly allowance, etc. . . . if no property be purchased, then two-thirds of the said surplus money should be divided amongst the beneficiaries under the wakf at the end of the year. . .

Para. 9.—That should a male mutwalli die, his children would get the allowance due to him; and as regards my daughters, the mutwalli shall have power to vary the allowance fixed for them at present and to pay or withhold payment of the allowance due to them to their children after their death; and should any of the beneficiaries under the wakf die childless and unmarried, his monthly allowance should form part of the tahabil of the trust and should be distributed amongst the other beneficiaries under the wakf or amongst some of them at the discretion of the mutwalli.

Then there are certain other paragraphs which provide for charitable uses if the descendants of the settler become extinct

Para. 18.—That be it mentioned that I am not indebted to any persons till now, and I make this wakf for the benefit of my lineal descendants and in their absence for the performance of my religious duties and for spending money for pious purposes.

It would appear on a mere perusal of this document that the provisions for the benefit of the settler's family are invalid as constituting a wakf under the Mahomedan law, and it is settled that they are not validated by the Mussalman Wakf Validating Act, 1913, which is not retrospective. This has been decided by a series of cases which I need only mention: see the cases of Mahomed Ahsanulla Chowdhry v. Amarchand Kundu (1), Abdul Gafar v. Nizamuddin (2), Abul Fata Mahomed Ishak v. Kasamaya Dhur Chowdhry (3), (a case coming from the same district as this, and the document in that case bears a strong resemblance with the document we are dealing with in this case), Mujib-un-nissa v. Abdur Rahim (4), Sayid Muhammad Munwar v. Razia Bibi (5) and Solehman Quadir v. Salimullah Bahadur (6).

It has, however, been argued on behalf of the respondent that, upon a true and proper construction of this document, it should be held that it has created a valid wakf. Reference is made to the fact that under para 9 it is stated that only the children of the beneficiaries would be entitled to the allowance under the wakf, and it is urged that the intention of the testator was that, after the death of all the children of the beneficiaries, the whole of the properties should be distributed for charitable purposes. This was sought to be supported by a rule of construction enunciated by the learned advocate for the respondent. It is stated to be this: that the first endeavour of the Court should be to find how a settlement made in a document may be held to be valid in law and then to put such meaning to the words as would make the settlement valid. The proposition seems to me to be somewhat novel. I should have thought that the true rule of construction is to find out the intention of the testator or settler from the expressions used in the document itself, and then to apply the law as to whether the intention so expressed is valid or not. If, however, it so happens that it is possible to construe a document in two different ways the Court may accept the construction which would make it valid. It seems to me that in this case there cannot be any doubt whatsoever that the settler intended, as he distinctly said, to perpetuate the names of his ancestors and to keep the property intact for ever, and he has repeated in clear terms:

It is for the benefit of my children, etc., how low soever, and in their absence for charitable purposes.

I do not think it necessary to say anything further upon the point as it seems to me that this deed of wakf falls within the decision of those cases I have referred to and is invalid.

The Subordinate Judge has held that there was a good valid dedication, because, in the schedule to the document, certain charitable purposes are mentioned. They may be detailed here:

	Rs.
Lighting costs of the Musjid
Re 1-8-0 per month ...	18 per year.
Sadbrat, i. e., feeding of travellers, Rs. 10 per month...	120 do.
Charity on Fridays, Rs. 4 per month ...	48 do.
Expenses during Sobeharat, etc. ...	170 do.
Prices of clothes given to the poor during winter at the discretion of the mutwalli.	100 do.

These altogether amount to Rs. 456 per year. The income of the property is stated to be about Rs. 10,000 per year. This gift for charity seems to be so small in comparison with the income of the property that the gift for charities may very well be considered to be quite illusory. As was observed by their Lordships in the case of Mahomed Ahsanulla Chowdhry v. Amarchand Kundu (1), that there is no reason to suppose that the charitable uses would absorb more than a devout and wealthy Mahomedan might find it becoming to spend it that way.

It is quite inconceivable that a person enjoying an income of Rs. 10,000 a year would not spend Rs 456 a year in these small charities which even poorer families in this country, whether Mahomedan or Hindu, spend for charitable purposes. A gift, as has been laid down in several of the cases decided by the Privy Council, may be quite illusory if the amount to be spent in charity is very small in comparison with the income of the property. A lengthy and a persistent argument was addressed to us with the object of showing that this wakf is quite different from the wakfs dealt with by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the cases I have referred to. Long extracts from the various judgments were read out to us in order to show that the wording in the document is different, or that the income of the property was different, and the amount which in the various cases was directed to be spent in charities was different from the amount stated in this particular case. In my opinion, this is not the proper way in which the validity or otherwise of the document in question should be decided with reference to the cases

If I am right in my view, that the document we have been dealing with does not constitute a true and bona fide gift for the benefit of the poor, but was created for the benefit of the family of the settler, then these minor differences in the language, or in the amount of money to be spent, would not take the case out of the decisions of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee. In my view, therefore, the wakf is invalid under the Mahomedan law, and this being secular property is liable to be partitioned amongst the descendants of the so-called settler Syed Bakht Majumdar, who have inherited their shares according to law

The next question that I have to deal with is the question of res judicata. Shortly stated, the point arises in this way, one Hamid held the office of mutwalli of the property at a certain time Majid, an ancestor of the plaintiffs, had contracted certain debts. The creditor attached some of the properties included in the deed of wakf in question in order to recover his dues from Majid on the allegation that Majid has a certain share in the properties. The then mutwalli, Hamid, preferred a claim. The claim of the mutwalli was disallowed by the trial Court on the ground that the wakf was invalid. A rule was obtained by the mutwalli and this Court set aside the judgment of the trial Court on the ground that in the matter of the claim it was necessary to see whether the claimant was in possession and, if so, whether he is in possession on behalf of the judgment-debtor or not; and as it was found that the claimant was in possession, but not on behalf of the judgment-debtor, the rule was made absolute and the properties were released from attachment. Then that creditor, Baktar Chand Mahata, brought a suit against the claimant as well as Majid, and this suit was dismissed. An appeal was preferred to the High Court, which was not proceeded with, and that was dismissed for default. The question of res judicata arises upon these proceedings.

It is contended by the learned advocate for the respondents that the judgment-debtor was bound by that decree by the principle of res judicata. His argument is this: that the judgment-creditor brought the suit both against the claimant as well as the judgment-debtor with the object of having it declared that the property belonged to the judgment-debtor and not to the claimant. The question of the right of the creditor could not be decided in that case without deciding the respective rights as between the judgment-debtor and the claimant, and as that question was decided in favour of the claimant, the judgment-debtor was as much bound as the judgment-creditor by that decision. It seems to me that that proposition cannot be supported on principle. On behalf of the appellants reliance has been placed on the case of Shivappa v. Dod Nagaya (7), in support of the contention that the judgment is not res judicata. The learned advocate for the respondent points out that the judgment-debtor not having been a party to the suit brought by the judgment-creditor against the claimant, that judgment was held to be not binding as res judicata as against the judgment-debtor. It is not quite clear from the report whether the judgment-debtor was a party defendant in the suit brought by the judgment-creditor. But in order to see whether the proposition put forward on behalf of the respondent is substantial the question may be tested in another way. Suppose the judgment-creditor loses in the suit brought by him for the purpose of establishment of his right to attach the property as against the judgment-debtor, does the decision have the effect of establishing that the property belongs to the claimant absolutely, so that if another judgment-creditor attaches the same property on the ground that it belongs to the same judgment-debtor, would he be defeated by the previous judgment having the force of res judicata? The learned advocate conceded that it is difficult for him to contend that it would be so. But if the judgment-debtor is for ever debarred from advancing his claim to the property as against the claimant by the previous judgment, it seems to me that the result would follow, that anybody claiming the property through him would also be similarly barred. As this seems to me to reduce the proposition to an absurdity, in my opinion, the judgment against the creditor who sought to attach the property cannot operate as res judicata as against the judgment-debtor in a suit brought by him against the claimant.

The next question is one of estoppel which arises in this way. Majid, the ancestor of the plaintiff, held the office of mutwalli under the document for some time. During the period he made a petition for being adjudicated an insolvent, and in opposition to the claim of a creditor he stated that the properties attached by the creditor were wakf properties and he was in possession of these properties as the mutwalli of an endowment. Upon that, the District Judge held that the properties were held by the insolvent not in his own right, but as mutwalli, and he directed that the properties should be released from attachment. How this can operate as an estoppel, it is difficult for me to understand. There was nothing done by Majid to alter the position of the contesting defendants or their ancestors. By his act he rather saved the property from being taken possession of by the receiver. The learned advocate for the respondent relied on the case of Mahomed Ibrahim v. Abdul Latif (8) in support of his contention, that Majid would have himself been estopped from asserting that he was not the mutwalli. The question has been elaborately discussed in the case of Alamgir Khan v. Kamrunnessa Khanum (9). The principle seems to me to be this. If a person takes possession of certain property as a mutwalli and holds possession of it on that basis, he cannot afterwards turn round and say that the wakf being void, he was in possession in his own right and claim the property as his own as against the beneficiaries. Having come into possession under one title, he cannot improve his position by asserting that that title was non-existent, but he held under some adverse right which extinguished the title of the beneficiaries under the deed by virtue of which he entered into possession. This is not the position here. Here the mutwalli was in possession and was distributing the income to the beneficiaries. Could he not say to the beneficiaries:

Now I discover that the settlement in wakf is void, I have no right to hold the property as mutwalli; you are really the owners of the property and I am only entitled to hold a share as the heir of the grantor. So you may get your shares if you like and I am willing to part with the possession of the properties as mutwalli in your favour.

It seems to me that there cannot be any estoppel as regards that position being taken by the mutwalli. This finishes the points on which the Subordinate Judge held that the suit of the plaintiff was liable to be dismissed.

The two points with regard to res judicata and estoppel do not affect the appeal of the defendants (in appeal No 175) except defendant 4. The other defendants, 14—17, would, in any event, be entitled to ask for partition of the properties if the wakf is a void document. That being so, I do not see any ground upon which it can be held that the suit should fail on any of the grounds which affects plaintiff or defendant 4 individually.

Next, I shall deal with the two points raised by the learned advocate, which were not dealt with by the learned Subordinate Judge, because he dismissed the suit on the other grounds. The first is the question of limitation. The contention on behalf of the respondent is that the mutwallis having been in possession from the date of the wakf in 1869 down to the date of the suit in 1922, they had acquired a title by adverse possession and the present mutwalli, defendant 1, is entitled to resist the claim.

of the plaintiff as well as the appealing defendants on the ground of adverse possession. In support of the contention, the cases of Churcher v. Martin (10), Kherodemoney Dossee v. Doorgamoney Dossee (11) and Mahomed Ibrahim v. Abdul Latif (8) were cited. I do not think it necessary to recite the facts of these cases. It seems to me that these cases simply lay down the rule that where trustees take possession of any property under a trust which is not valid under the law, their possession is as much adverse to the lawful title as the possession of any other trespasser, and if the possession of those so-called trustees is for a sufficient period, the rightful owner may very well be met with a plea of limitation under the statute. The question here seems to me to be quite different.

The learned advocate for the respondent has argued that here the mutwalli was a trustee and he has acquired the title as trustee by his adverse possession. The mutwalli, however, has no legal estate in the property. This has been well settled: see the case of Vidya Varuthi Thirtha-swamigal v. Balusami Ayyar (12), followed in Abdur Rahim v. Narayandas Aurora (13). But it is argued by the learned advocate for the respondent that the successive mutwallis were in possession on behalf of the Supreme Being and, therefore, he may assert the title on behalf of his principal as against the plaintiff and the appealing defendants. But the fact is not so. If the dedication had been to the Supreme Being, then no question of adverse possession would arise, but the plaintiff would fall, on the ground that he and his cosharers have no title to the property. It was only a fictitious gift to God. The real object was to tie up the property for the benefit of the descendants of the settler and the descendants were getting the benefit out of the property all along and not the Supreme Being. Under such circumstances, it is very difficult to see how the question of limitation arises. Moreover, it is pointed out on behalf of the appellant that the evidence shows that the several cosharers were in actual possession of the properties by collection of rents; and there is one document on the record which shows that the contesting defendant, even after the suit, has taken a patni in the name of his son from defendants 4 and 14 to 17, that is, the appellants in appeal No. 175. It is urged on behalf of the respondents that this was after the date of the suit and ought not to have been used as evidence in the case. But it seems to have been admitted without any objection. Whatever that may be, there is no reasonable ground for holding that the possession of the preceding mutwalli was ever adverse to the descendants of the original settler. The plea of limitation must, therefore, fail.

Lastly, the question of jurisdiction under the Assam Land and Revenue Regulation may be dealt with. It is quite true that under S. 154 (1) (e), read with S. 96 of the Act, partition, whether perfect or imperfect, of revenue-paying properties, must be made by the revenue authorities. But the jurisdiction of the civil Court to determine the right of the parties to the property in dispute, as well as the shares to which they are entitled, has not been taken away by the regulation in question and the civil Court must also decide whether the property is liable to partition or not, as in this case, whether there is a valid wakf which prevents the parties from seeking a partition of the property. The plaintiff, as well as the appealing defendants, are entitled to obtain a declaration from the civil Court, that they have got the right to obtain from the revenue authorities a separation and allotment of their shares in the estate according to their proportionate rights. It is further pointed out by the appellants that all the properties in suit are not revenue-paying properties. These must be partitioned by the civil Court. It is also alleged that the parties are in possession of separate parcels of lands, being only shares in certain revenue-paying estates. These do not fall within the provisions of the Assam regulation. The moveable properties should also be partitioned and the Court should also give an opportunity to the plaintiff for finding out whether there are any other properties which are capable of being partitioned. The actual partition of revenue-paying estates must necessarily be made according to the provisions of the Assam Land and Revenue Regulation,

The appeals are, therefore, allowed and the case sent back to the trial Court for a decision as to the properties which are liable to be partitioned by the civil Court, and to make a partition according to the shares of the parties. If it is found by the Court that revenue-paying properties have to be partitioned among the parties, the Court may declare the share of each of the parties and leave them to go to the revenue authorities for making the necessary partition

The appellants are entitled to their costs in Appeal No 175 of 1925 against defendant 1 and defendants 8, 11, 18, 34, and 66. The appellant in Appeal No. 261 of 1925 is entitled to her costs against respondent-defendant 1. The hearing-fee in each case is fixed at 20 gold mohurs. The plaintiff will get her costs of the lower Court from defendant 1 and defendants 8, 11, 18, 34 and 66. Further costs of the lower Court will abide the final result

• Appeal No 686 of 1926, Decided on 25th July 1927, from appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Murshidabad, D/- 9th January 1925

(a) Civil P. C., S. 100 — Agreement by both sides to proceed on the evidence before the Court and also before the Commissioner—Its violation as a defect calling for interference in second appeal.

Where, both sides having agreed to proceed not only on the evidence taken before the Munsif but before the commissioner also, the plaintiff-appellant was told in the lower appellate Court that the case should proceed after discarding the evidence that was taken before the commissioner.

Held: that there was a defect of procedure in the trial of the appeal before the lower appellate Court, and the defect affected the merits of the case, and therefore calls for interference in second appeal. [P 137 C 1]

Mitter, J.—This is an appeal from a judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge of Murshidabad, dated the 9th January 1925, which reversed a judgment and decree of the Munsif of Berhampore, dated the 30th April 1923.

The appeal arises out of a suit commenced by the plaintiff for rent for the last kist of 1325 and for the years 1326 to 1328 B. S., in respect of a tenure which was held by the defendant respondent under the plaintiff-appellant. Defendant's plea was that he was dispossessed from a portion of the land which he purchased at a rent sale in February 1920 and of which he got possession in May 1920. His case is that, after he had purchased the disputed tenure at a sale held at the instance of the plaintiff, he was dispossessed from plots 1 and 5 of the sale certificate 1921. The rent was a consolidated rent.

A local investigation was directed at the instance of the defendant for the purpose of determining as to whether the land from which he alleged he had been dispossessed by the landlord was really covered by the sale certificate. The local investigation proceeded to some extent. Evidence of certain witnesses was recorded on both sides. The costs payable to the commissioners fell short and the defendant was directed to pay the balance of the costs of the commissioner in order to enable him to complete his report. The defendant failed to pay that sum. The Munsif then directed the commissioner to return all the papers. Subsequently, at the instance of the plaintiff, the commissioner completed the map of the lands measured by him for which he was paid by the plaintiff and he submitted a letter forwarding the map and the evidence to the Munsif.

Upon the result of the local investigation, such as it was, and upon the other evidence in the case, the Munsif came to the conclusion that the defendant had failed to establish his defence, and he granted a modified decree to the plaintiff for the amounts claimed for the years 1326 to 1328 B. S. with damages thereon at 25 per cent and proportionate costs

An appeal was taken by the defendant to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Murshidabad and the learned Subordinate Judge discarded the report of the commissioner, such as it was, and the evidence which was taken before him, and after discarding the evidence which was taken by the commissioner he proceeded to deal with the appeal on the other evidence in the case and came to the conclusion that the defendant had been dispossessed from plots 1 and 5 of the plaint, and, as it was a tenancy in which the rent was a lump rent, he held that the entire rent should be suspended. He accordingly allowed the appeal and dismissed the suit of the plaintiff.

A second appeal has been taken to this Court by plaintiff 1, and it is contended on his behalf that the lower appellate Court was clearly in error in discarding the proceedings before the commissioner and the evidence taken before him, as the lower appellate Court seems erroneously to think that there was no report of the commissioner. We have looked into the report and we find that there was a letter, which was filed along with the map, and the evidence taken before the commissioner. As to whether there was a report, as is required strictly under O 26, R 10 Civil P C, it appears that in this case both sides proceeded in the trial Court to rely on the evidence of witnesses taken before the commissioner. As will appear from some of the observations made by the Munsif in the trial before him, the defendant-respondent relied on the evidence of one Jadu Pramanik who was examined before the commissioner as the strongest piece of evidence in his favour. Both sides having agreed to proceed not only on the evidence taken before the Munsif, but before the commissioner also, it seems a little hard that the plaintiff-appellant was told in the lower appellate Court that the case should proceed after discarding the evidence that was taken before the commissioner.

There has been a defect of procedure in the trial of the appeal before the lower appellate Court, such as calls for our interference under S. 100, Civil P C., and I think that the defect has affected the merits of the case. The defendant raised the plea of dispossession and it was essential for him to establish the plea to defeat the plaintiff's suit for rent which was justly due to him

In these circumstances I think that the judgment and decree of the lower appellate Court dismissing the suit should be set aside and the case should be sent back to that Court for a retrial of the appeal on the evidence which was taken before the Munsif and also on the evidence which was taken before the commissioner. Costs will abide the result

Judgment—This appeal arises out of a suit for rent brought for a sepatni mehal called Monoharpur. The plea of the defendants was that the entire rent should be suspended on account of the plaintiffs having failed to deliver possession of certain portions of the lands demised. This plea found favour with the Munsif who dismissed the entire suit. The plaintiffs appealed against that decree and the Subordinate Judge has made a partial decree in favour of the plaintiffs by allowing an apportionment of the rent of the lease hold properties in proportion to the lands found in possession of the defendants. This case is a rather peculiar one. It appears that the predecessors-in-interest of the plaintiffs created the sepatni lease in question of the mouzah called Monoharpur in the year 1857. The sepatnidars gave an ijara of the properties to their landlords in 1866. The ijara was to last for 15 years. In 1867 the original sepatnidars sold their interest to the defendant's predecessors. From 1867 the predecessors of the defendants, and after them the defendants, have been in possession of the sepatni mehal by paying the rent reserved in the lease till the arrears claimed in the suit. The plaintiffs purchased the interest of the patnidars and dar patnidar in the mehal in the year 1918 and they have brought this suit for rent in February 1921. What the plaintiffs alleged in answer to the defence of the defendants was that the lands which, the defendants say, appertained to mouzah Monoharpur really appertained to their mouzah called Nishchindipur. That has been found against them by the Subordinate Judge and this finding must be accepted by us as a finding of fact. The question, however, that remains to be decided is whether the defendants are entitled to any abatement of rent for the lands which the lower appellate Court has found to be within their mouzah but of which they are not shown to have ever been in possession. Although the defendants have never been in possession of the lands, they have been paying the entire rent reserved in the kabuliyat for more than 60 years before suit. Under what circumstances the lands continued to remain in the possession of the landlords it is very difficult to find out. The inference from this long submission of the defendants to be kept out of possession of these lands while they were paying the full rent would lead to an inference that these lands were never meant to be given to the defendant's predecessors.

However that may be, as was observed in the case of Ram Narain v. Poolin Behari (1), we must hold that the right of the defendants to ask for abatement of rent after the lapse of 60 years must be considered to have been lost by acquiescence and laches. Whether the defendants are entitled to the lands in question as appertaining to their leasehold, or whether they have any substantive right which they can enforce by suit as against the landlords for recovery of possession of these lands by reason of successive acknowledgments of the title of the defendants by the plaintiffs-landlords, are questions which do not arise for consideration in this case. If the defendants have such a right they must enforce it by taking proper steps. It is sufficient for us to say in this case that the right to claim abatement must, under the circumstances of the case, be considered to have been lost by defendant's laches and long acquiescence.

In this view, this appeal must be allowed and the plaintiffs' suit decreed with costs in all the Courts.

The cross-objection has not been pressed and it is dismissed without costs.

Appeal No. 2200 of 1924, Decided on 8th August 1927, from appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Mymensingh, D/- 28th June 1924.

An action for damages against one or some of the several joint wrongdoers is maintainable, but such an action is entirely distinct from an action in ejectment. In the former the cause of action is the injury sustained, while in the other the detention of the property. Thomas v. Widd (1840) 11 Ad. & E. 453. [1' 140 C 2 ; P 141 C 1]

(b) Ejectment—Suit for—All persons in possession should be joined as defendants.

The principles governing the rule of joinder of defendants in an action for ejectment are mainly two : first, if any of the persons in possession is left out, he remains in possession as not being affected by the decree, and the decree as one in ejectment and for possession becomes infructuous because the persons ejected as being bound by the decree can always come in under the person who remains in possession ; and second, there is a certain amount of risk involved in not making the persons in actual possession defendants, for, in execution of the decree, persons may happen to be turned out who may then bring actions against the plaintiff for wrongful dispossession, not being bound by the decree. [P 141 C 2]

which he may be in possession it is obvious that it is not possible to apply the principle embodied in the first part of this rule.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit which was instituted by the plaintiffs to recover khas possession of certain lands on declaration of the plaintiffs' maliki right thereto. The plaintiffs' case was that one Rahamat Sheikh held an ordinary jote, that he abandoned the same and went away from the village without making any arrangements for payments of rent of the jote and that the plaintiffs wanted to take possession of the lands but were resisted by the defendants. Of the defendants against whom the suit was instituted only one, viz defendant 5, filed a written statement and contested the suit. The substantial defence of defendant 5 was that Sheikh Rahamat's sons sold a portion of the lands to defendant 5 and his brothers (one of whom was defendant 6) in 1316, that since the said sale defendant 5 and his brothers have been in possession of the lands which they had purchased, and the heirs of Sheikh Rahamat were in possession of the remaining lands of the jote. The defence thus put forward was that there was no abandonment but only a transfer of a part of the holding.

The trial Court found that there was a complete abandonment of the holding and decreed the suit except as against defendant 6 who died during the pendency of the suit. He found that defendant 6 had left a mother who was alive, and though the latter was not brought on the record as the heir of defendant 6 the suit would not fail. Defendant 5 appealed from this decision. The Sub-Judge framed three questions for determination: 1st, Is the suit maintainable against the other defendants without making the legal representative of the deceased defendant 6 parties to the suit; second, Was there any abandonment of the holding held by Rahamat and his successors; and third, Are plaintiffs entitled to khas possession. He did not determine the second and the third questions as his answer to the first question was in the negative. The suit was therefore dismissed. The plaintiffs have then appealed to this Court.

The suit, as framed in the plaint, was against the heirs of Rahamat Sheikh who were defendants 1 to 3, the purchasers who were defendants 4 to 6, and the sub-tenants defendants 7 and 8. It was, as has been already stated, a suit for khas possession.

The maintainability of the suit in the absence of the heirs of defendant 6 has been sought to be justified on the footing of the liability of joint wrongdoers, it being urged that it is a joint and several liability. In actions for damages joint wrongdoers may be sued jointly or severally. The principles relating to these actions are well settled. In Pollock on the Law of Torts, 10th edition, p 206, they are stated thus:

Where more than one person is concerned in the commission of a wrong the person wronged has his remedy against all or any of them at his choice. Every wrongdoer is liable for the whole damage, and it does not matter whether they acted, as between themselves, as equals, or one of them as agent or servant of another. There are no degrees of responsibility, nothing answering to the distinction in criminal law between principals and accessories. But when the plaintiff in such a case has made his choice he is concluded by it. After recovering judgment against some or one of the joint authors of a wrong he cannot sue the others for the same matter, even if the judgment in the first action remains unsatisfied. By that judgment the cause of action "transit in rem judicatum" and is no longer available. The reason of the rule is stated that otherwise a vexatious multiplicity of actions would be encouraged.

As regards joint torts it is said in Addison's Law of Torts, 8th edition, p 44:

All who aid or counsel, direct or join in, the commission of a tort are joint tortfeasors. "If divers do a trespass it is joint and several at the will of him to whom the wrong is done" that is to say, he can sue any one or more of them at his election, and those who are sued cannot insist on having the others joined as defendants.

In Thurman Wild (1) and other cases it was settled that an accord and satisfaction by one wrongdoer for the whole injury done discharges all the wrongdoers. A release, therefore, given of the whole cause of action to one discharges the others, the reason being that the cause of action being one and indivisible, some having been released, all persons otherwise liable thereto are consequently released: Coske v Jennor (2). But a covenant or agreement not to sue one of them is no defence to an action against others. Hutton v Eyre (3). If, therefore, while purporting to release one tortfeasor it reserves rights against another, it will be construed as a covenant not to sue, and not a release: Duck v Mayen (4), Rice v Reed (5). The rule for construing such a document was laid down in the case of Price v Barker (6), where it was held that in determining, whether a document be a release or a covenant not to sue, the intention of the parties was to be carried out, and if it were clear that the right against a joint debtor was intended to be preserved inasmuch as such a right would not be preserved, if the document were held to be a release, the proper construction, where this was sought to be done, was that it was a covenant not to sue and not a release. In King v. Hoare (7) Parke, B., authoritatively laid down:

These considerations lead us, quite satisfactorily to our minds, to the conclusion that, where judgment has been obtained for a debt, as well as a tort, the right given by the record merges the inferior remedy by action for the same debt or tort against another party. see also Buckland v. Johnson (8), Brinsmead v. Harrison (9) and Kendall v. Hamilton (10).

Brinsmead v. Harrison (9) settled the point that, after recovering judgment against one wrongdoer, a plaintiff cannot sue the other for the same matter, even if the first action remains unsatisfied, a proposition which was doubted before them. Though S 43,

Indian Contract Act, is not perhaps quite clear whether a complete adaptation of the English rule is intended, yet King v. Hoare (7) has been held to apply in this country both in respect of joint debtors and of joint wrongdoers. A fortiori then, an action for damages against one or some of several joint wrongdoers is maintainable.

Such an action, however, is entirely distinct from an action in ejectment. At common law there were only two kinds of redress from actionable wrong. One was to take the law into one's own hands of which it has been said thus:

It is only when the party's lawful act restores to him something which he ought to have, or puts an end to a state of things whereby he is wronged, or at least puts pressure on the wrongdoer to do him right, that self-help is a true remedy...The acts of this nature, which we meet with in the law of torts, are expulsion of a trespasser, re-taking of goods by the rightful possessor, distress damage feasant, and abatement of nuisances. Peaceable re-entry upon land where there has been a wrongful change of possession is possible, but hardly occurs in modern experience. Pollock on the Law of Torts, 10th edition, p. 189.

Possession could be recovered from an early time, but in an action which was one of trespass in form only and in reality was a sort of a real action. Before the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. C. 76) actions of ejectment were in point of form pure fictions, and of these actions it is thus said in Cole on Ejectment, p. 2:

The whole proceeding was an ingenious fiction, dexterously contrived so as to raise in every case the only real question, viz., the claimant's title or right of possession, and to exclude every other, and whereby the delay and expense of special pleadings and the danger of variances by an incorrect statement of the claimant's title or estate were avoided. But it was objectionable, on the ground that fictions and unintelligible forms should not be used in Courts of justice; especially when the necessity for them might be avoided by a simple writ so framed as to raise precisely the same question in a true, concise, and intelligible form. This has been attempted with considerable success in the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852.

15 and 16 Vic. C. 76 S. 168, directed that:

Instead of the present proceeding by ejectment a writ shall be issued, directed to all the persons in possession by name and to all persons, entitled to defend the possession of the property claimed, which property shall be described in the writ with reasonable certainty.

The Act of 1852 practically retained the old form of action, divested of the fictions on which it depended. As regards the parties to be made defendants in an action of ejectment the following is what is said in Dicey's Parties to an Action, pp. 494 and 497.

The persons to be made defendants in an action of ejectment, i. e., to be named in the writ, are all the tenants in possession of the land etc., sought to be recovered The persons to be named in the writ are, therefore, all the tenants in possession, i. e., every person who occupies as tenant or under-tenant (or as owner) any part of the property All the persons in actual occupation of the land claimed must, as already pointed out, be named in the writ and made defendants.

In Cole on Ejectment, p. 75, it is said:

The general rule on the subject is, that the action should be brought against all the tenants in possession, i. e., every person who occupies, as a tenant or under-tenant, any part of the property: Doe d. Smith v. Roe (11), Doe d. Williamson v. Roe (12); Doe d. Lord Darlington v. Cook (13); Doe d. Turner v. Gee (14).

In every case, however, regard must be had to the circumstances, e. g., where the real intention of the action is to turn out the tenant and not the sub-tenants and the sub-tenants are numerous the latter need not be joined: Glen v. Herring (15). If a person in possession but not claiming through the defendant is not sued but ejected, he may have the judgment set aside on being added as a party: Minet v. Johnson (16).

The cause of action in an action for damages is the injury sustained, while in that of action for ejectment is the detention of the property. The two causes of action are essentially distinct, and the principles applicable are radically different.

In Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol 23, p. 102 the principles are summarized thus:

Para. 179.—The proper defendant in an action of tort is the wrongdoer or the person who is liable for the acts of the wrongdoer or to whom the liability for the injury has passed. If several persons jointly commit tort they may all be sued jointly for such tort, or any one or more of them may be sued separately, and if one of several wrongdoers is thus sued the plaintiff cannot be obliged to join any of the others as co-defendants.

Para. 180.—In an action brought for the recovery of land, all the persons who are in possession should in general be joined as defendants.

The principles governing the rule of joinder of defendants in an action for ejectment are mainly two: first, if any of the persons in possession is left out, he remains in possession as not being affected by the decree, and the decree as one in ejectment and for possession becomes infructuous because the persons ejected as being bound by the decree can always come in under the person who remains in possession; and second, there is a certain amount of risk involved in not making the persons in actual possession defendants, for in execution of the decree persons may happen to be turned out who may then bring actions against the plaintiff for wrongful dispossession, not being bound by the decree.

It may, however, happen that the existence of a person in possession is not known to the plaintiff and so he is omitted, or one who is not in possession is wrongly impleaded, in the action. In cases such as these, as observed in Cole on Ejectment, pp 84-85

. . . . If the name of any tenant in possession be omitted as a defendant those parts of the premises which are in his occupation cannot be recovered in that action. On the other hand, if the name of any person be inserted as a defendant, who is not actually a tenant in possession of any part of the property claimed, it will probably be necessary to obtain a Judge's order to amend the writ by striking out his name and to amend the writ accordingly.

In a case where the plaintiff has alleged in the plaint that a person is in possession, and there is no question of any particular share of which he may be in possession, it is obvious that it is not possible to apply the principle embodied in the first part of this rule.

For the application of the rule, that in an action in ejectment all persons in possession should be impleaded as defendants, there is no distinction in principle between the cases of trespassers and of tenants who claim to hold under a title, because all actions in ejectment proceed on the assumption that the plaintiff has title and hence the right to possession, and that the defendant has none. The rule that all persons in actual possession should be joined as parties has been recognized in this country upon good authority: Banuri v. Narsingrao (17) Kali Narayan Roy v. Haran Chandri Ghose (18); Sarat Kamini Dasi v Chaitanya Charan (19); Siddik Ahmed Keran v. Azizur Rahaman Khan (20). The principle that a suit will not be entertained where no effective decree can be passed in it is well recognized: Haran Sheikh v. Romesh Chandra (21).

The result then is that the appellant's contention, that the suit was maintainable in the absence of the heirs of defendant 6, must fail. There has, however, been no investigation on the question as to whether the mother of defendant 6 is in possession, and if so, whether she is not in possession of any specific plot out of the land in suit. In view of the exceptional nature of the case in which the said defendant has left only a mother surviving him, we think the plaintiff should be given an opportunity of establishing that the said widow may very well be left out on an investigation held on the lines indicated in the judgment of this Court in Sarat Kamini Das v. Chaitanya Charan Prohoraj (19).

We accordingly set aside the decree of the lower appellate Court and send back the case to that Court so that the plaintiff may be given such an opportunity, and that on giving the defendants also a chance of producing any materials in rebuttal, that they may desire to dispose of the appeal in accordance with law.

The appeal is thus allowed and the case remanded to the lower appellate Court. Costs of this appeal will abide the result.

Judgment.—This appeal by the plaintiffs arises out of a suit for rent with regard to a portion of the decree made by the Additional District Judge of Alipore affirming the decision of the Subordinate Judge. The plaintiffs let out a large tract of land to the defendant in 1315. The land was jungle and the lease was a reclamation lease stipulating that the tenant was to pay rent at the rate of twelve annas per bigha for the lands under cultivation. It was stated in the lease that the area demised was about 1,000 bighas. The suit was for arrears of rent from 1323 to 1326. The dispute was as regards the area actually under cultivation. It was found that the defendant had encroached upon a certain area of jungle lands within the khas mahal of the Government contiguous to the land of the plaintiffs which was demised to the defendant. The plaintiffs claim rent with regard to those lands also which actually belong to Government. The answer of the defendant is that he is not liable to pay rent to the plaintiffs for those lands. It is contended on behalf of the appellants that when a tenant encroaches upon the contiguous waste land either of the landlord or of a neighbouring proprietor, such encroachment enures for the benefit of the landlord, and the encroached land becomes a part of the tenure. That being so, according to the law in England as well as in this country, the plaintiffs, as the landlords of the defendant, are entitled to recover rent on account of the lands encroached upon. The rule in England is that, so long as the tenant is in possession of the encroached land, he holds it as a part of the demised premises and, after the end of the term, the landlord is entitled to get possession of that land. There is no question under the English law of getting an increased rent for the increased area. Babu Brojo Lal, however, contends, on the strength of the principle that a tenant making an encroachment on the neighbouring land holds it as a part of the tenure, he is liable to pay increased rent for increased area to his landlord with regard to the contiguous land encroached upon although it belongs to a third party. There is no authority for this proposition, and the difficulty in accepting this contention is that, if it is correct, the position of the tenant who encroaches upon such land would be to place him under two opposing fires. The true owner of the land encroached upon may either sue to eject him and ask for damages or he may sue for fair and equitable rent according to the practice prevailing in this country where a squatter takes possession of waste or jungle land. In such a case, if the true owner sues the tenant for rent, according to the proposition enunciated by Babu Brojo Lal, he would be liable to pay rent both to his landlord with regard to the demised premises and to the owner of the encroached land. This difficulty is sought to be met by Babu Brojo Lal, by the answer that if the true owners sue his tenant, then his client would not certainly be entitled to recover any rent on account of the encroached land. But, so long as the true owner does not come, Babu Brojo Lal's contention, is that he is entitled to claim rent from his tenant. That proposition if properly tested, would lead to curious results. Let us assume that Babu Brojo Lal's client sues the tenant for one year's rent and recovers a decree for the lands the tenant had encroached upon. After he has obtained his decree and realized the money, the true owner sues the tenant for rent or damages for use and occupation. The true owner would naturally succeed in his suit. What would be the position of the tenant then? He cannot recover from his landlord the money paid in execution of a decree passed by a Court and, therefore, he would be liable both to his own landlord as well as to the true owner whose land he has encroached upon for a single act of trespass. The proposition, therefore, put forward by the appellants, does not appear to be a correct one. The appeal must accordingly be dismissed with costs.

Ganada Charan Sen and Ramendra Chandra Roy—for Opposite Party.

Suhrawardy, J—This rule has been obtained by the plaintiff against an order of the Subordinate Judge of 24 Parganas, dated 12th April 1927, permitting the wife of the defendant to conduct the defence on his behalf under the following circumstances: The defendant Protap Chandra Basu was the cashier and collecting agent for a number of years working under the plaintiff. The plaintiff's case is that on one morning he found the defendant absconding with the key of the iron safe in his charge. A criminal case was brought against him, but he is still absconding. The present suit has been instituted for accounts against Protap Chandra Basu and the plaintiff also applied for attachment before judgment of certain sums of money. Thereafter the opposite party No. 2, Bagala Sundari Dasi, applied for permission to conduct the case on behalf of her husband on the ground that her husband was either murdered by the plaintiff or was being kept in solitary confinement at the plaintiff's instance.

The learned Subordinate Judge has been unable to find whether the version of the plaintiff was true or the defendant's wife's version relating to the disappearance of the defendant was true, and permitted the wife to conduct the case on behalf of her absent husband. The order passed by the Subordinate Judge is based on two grounds. His interpretation of O 1, R. 11 gave him enough jurisdiction to entrust the defence to the wife though she was not a party to the suit. The other ground is that if O. 1, R. 11 does not apply the Civil Procedure Code is silent and there is no express provision to meet the contingency that has arisen in the present case and, therefore, in the exercise of inherent jurisdiction vested in the Court he can give the conduct of the suit to the opposite party No. 2.

It has been argued before us that O 1, R 11 does not authorize the Court to give the permission, as above stated, and that, as there is no provision in the Code for allowing a third party to conduct a suit on behalf of an absent party without special authorization the Court has no power to give such permission. As regards the first ground it is contended on behalf of the opposite party that the word "person" in O. 1, R 11 includes any person—he be a party to the suit or not—and the Court has jurisdiction to give such permission to the wife in the present case to conduct the defence on behalf of her husband. As this is a case of first impression and no authorities are available either for or against, I have given my very careful consideration to the contentions raised on both sides and I find myself unable to agree with the interpretation put upon the rule by the Court below and urgently pressed before us by the learned advocate appearing for the opposite party. The main argument upon which this view is supported is that O 1, R 11 reproduces the provision of the last paragraph of S. 32 of the Code of 1882, which was as follows: The Court may give the conduct of the suit to such plaintiff as it deems proper." The present Code has in O 1, R 11 reproduced all the words of the repealed section except that the word "plaintiff" has been changed into "person." It is accordingly argued that this change is instructive and gives an inkling into the mind of the legislature as to what was really meant by the change, and it is said that the legislature intended by the alteration of the words to invest the Court with power to give the conduct of the suit to any person whom it deems proper, be such person a party to the suit or a stranger to it. I do not think that the idea with which this alteration was made was as has been suggested by the opposite party. The alteration has been made in order to assimilate the wording of the rule of the Code to the corresponding rule of the Supreme Court in England. Order 16, R. 39 of the rules of the Supreme Court is, so far as is relevant for our present purpose, in these words:

The Court or a Judge may require any person to be made a party to any action or proceeding, and may give the conduct of the action or proceeding to such person as he may think fit.

Under the English law the few cases which have been decided under this rule show that the Court has as much power to give the conduct of the suit to one of the plaintiffs as the conduct of the defence to one of the defendants: see the case of Peek v Ray (1). The further reason for the alteration seems to be that under the law, as it stood under the repealed Civil Procedure Code, the Court had power to entrust one of the plaintiffs with the prosecution of the suit. As it was deemed to be desirable that the power of the Court to put one of the parties in charge of the suit should be extended to the conduct of the defence, a general word was used to include both the plaintiff and the defendant. As I have said, there is no case in support of the view pressed by the opposite party or that which I feel disposed to adopt; but the commentators of the Civil Procedure Code have put an interpretation on this rule which accords with my reading of the law. I only refer to their opinion in support of the view which I take in this matter independently of what they have stated. Sir John Woodroffe, in his well-known edition of the Civil Procedure Code observes, commenting on O. 1, R. 11, as follows :

The word "suit" does not ordinarily include defence, but, according to the English practice, the conduct of the defence also is often given to one of the defendants Apparently with a view to adopt that practice, the "person" has been substituted for the "plaintiff."

This view has been accepted and adopted by another commentator, Mr. Nandlal in his useful edition of the Civil Procedure Code. There is a decision in the Madras Court which shows how this rule has been understood. In Saminatha Pillai. v. Rajagopal Mudaliar (2) the learned Judges held that it was permissible under O 1, R. 11 to transpose a defendant as a plaintiff and give him the conduct of the suit. The order within which R 11 appears is described in the heading as relating to parties to suit, which lends strength to the view I have adopted. The word "person" has been used in several rules under that order. Though I do not think that the meaning which may be given to that word in any rule will necessarily govern the meaning of the word used in R. 11, a reference to the various rules in O. 1 may be made to show that the word "person" was not used in any particular sense by the legislature and that it should be interpreted according to context. R 1 says that all persons may be joined in one suit . . . if such persons brought separate suits, any common question of law or fact would arise R 3 says that all persons may be joined as defendants where, if separate suits were brought against such persons, any common question of law or fact would arise There can be no doubt that the word "person" used in these rules means persons who are parties to the suits. R 6 empowers the plaintiff to join as parties to the same suit all or any of the persons severally or jointly and severally liable. R 7 says :

Where the plaintiff is in doubt as to the person from whom he is entitled to obtain redress he may join two or more defendants

In these two rules the word "person" has been used to indicate a person who is or may be a party to the suit. Some stress has been laid upon the use of the word in R. 8. It says :

Where there are numerous persons having the same interest in a suit, one or more of such persons may . . . sue or be sued.

Clause 2 of the rule says :

Any person on whose behalf or for whose benefit a suit is instituted . . . may apply to the Court to be made a party to such suit

It is argued that the word "person" in this rule means a person who is not a party to the suit and the use of the two words "person" and "party" in Cl. 2 indicates that the legislature intended to mark some distinction between the two classes of persons described as "person" and "party." I do not think that there is much substance in this contention. The word "person" has been used in the rule in the ordinary sense and it cannot be suggested that any other word could have been used. The rule deals with cases in which various persons are interested and it authorizes one of such persons to sue or defend on behalf of the others. As I have said the rule opens with the words "one or more of such persons may sue or be sued"; the word "persons" there must mean those who are virtually parties to the suit Cl. 2 makes no distinction between "person" and "party," but only says that any person may apply to be made a party. In R 10 the word "person" has been similarly used without bearing any special significance. The rule says :

Where a suit has been instituted in the name of the wrong person as plaintiff the Court may order any other person to be substituted or added as plaintiff upon such terms as the Court thinks fit.

Here the word "person" has been used for the plaintiff on the record, as also for a person who may be substituted or added as plaintiff. In Cl (2) it is laid down that if a party is improperly joined or the name of any other person ought to have been joined, whether as plaintiff or defendant, the Court may pass order as authorized by the rule. Here the person who has been improperly joined has been described as a "party" because he is a party to the suit, and anyone whom the Court thinks should be added as a party to the suit has been described as a "person" because he was not a party at the stage. Cl. 3 of the rule says that no person shall be added as a plaintiff or as the next friend without his consent. The use of the word "person" does not give us much help in interpreting the word in R 12. It is contended on behalf of the opposite party that the word "person" in R. 11 must be taken in its ordinary sense meaning anyone including a person who is not a party to the suit. But one of the canons of construction of a statute is that reasonable interpretation should be given to each word. It seems unreasonable to hold that the legislature, by the use of the word in R 11, has intended that the Court may authorize anyone to appear on behalf of a party to the suit and have the conduct of the suit except under special provisions contained in the Code itself. The result of adopting the view which has been pressed upon us will be that no party to a suit may appear and the Court may give power to any one to conduct the suit or defend it on behalf of a party. Of course, there is the safeguard that the Court will exercise judicial discretion, but the investing of the Court with such general authority seems to be unreasonable. A reference to R 12 may be made. There it is laid down that, where there are more plaintiffs or defendants than one, they may authorize one of them to conduct or defend the suit. If it was intended that anyone who is not a party to the suit may be entrusted with the conduct of the suit it was not necessary, under R. 12 that one of the parties should be empowered for the purpose. On all these considerations I am of opinion that the word "person" in O. 1, R 11 means a party to the suit, and that a person who is a stranger to the suit cannot be given the conduct of the suit within the meaning of that rule. In this view this rule is made absolute with costs, and the order of the lower Court, empowering the opposite party No. 2, Bagala Sundari Dasi to conduct the defence on behalf of the defendant Pratap Chandra Basu, is set aside. We assess the hearing-fee at four gold mohurs.

Siba Kumari Devi—Plaintiff—Appellant

Doshi Ghosain — Defendant—Respondent.

Appeals Nos 1159 to 1161 of 1925, Decided on 26th July 1927, from appellate decrees of Dist Judge, Nadia, D/-15th December 1924.

(a) Bengal Tenancy Act, S 109A—Application covering matter other than that of settlement of rent—Second appeal lies.

Where an application to the Settlement Officer for a settlement of fair and equitable rent does not cover only the matter of settlement of rent within the meaning of those words in S. 109A but some other points also: there is a right of second appeal. [P 146 C 2]

(b) Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 105 (1)—Application for substitution even after two months from the final publication of Record-of-Rights is valid.

When S. 105 (1), Beng. Ten. Act, speaks of an application, it is not necessary for the landlord or the tenant making the application to name any person. It is only necessary to indicate the holdings in the record in respect of which a settlement of fair and equitable rent is sought, and therefore an application to 'bring on record the heir or transferee of the right of the tenant after two months from the final publication of the Record-of-Rights is perfectly good: A. I. R. 1926 Cal. 1037, Foll. [P 147 C 1]

(c) Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 105—Application made only against one of the joint tenants—Landlord's remedy under S. 105 is exhausted.

Where an application for settlement of rent against one of the co-tenants was made and the matter was fought out to a finish in the landlord's presence and ultimately the application was dismissed on the ground that such an application must be brought against all the joint tenants:

Held: that in such a case the landlord's remedy under S. 105 must be deemed to be exhausted and he must pursue his remedies in civil Court if any. [P 147 C 2]

Rankin, C. J.—These are three appeals from a decision of the District Judge of Nadia, sitting as a special Judge affirming a decision of the Assistant Settlement Officer of Krishnagar.

In each of these cases the landlord appellant made an application to the Settlement Officer for a settlement of fair and equitable rent. The application appears to be in a printed form, and it is somewhat difficult to make sure of the nature and exact scope of the claim intended to be conveyed by it. The body of the document appears to raise every possible claim including questions of excess area of lands. However, taking the document as a whole, we are not satisfied that the only matter dealt with by that application is settlement of rent within the meaning of those words in S 109A, and we are not prepared to say that in these cases there is no right of second appeal. Accordingly it becomes necessary to examine into the particular facts.

In S. A No 1159 it appears that an application was made within two months of the final publication of the Record-of-Rights. It would seem that the Record-of-Rights recorded the tenancy in the name of a lady, Bhussani. The Record-of-Rights was finally published in November 1922. On 14th April 1923, the defendant Doshi

Ghosain was added as a party. It then turned out that, while she was added as being the heiress of Bhussani, she was not the heiress of, but a purchaser from, Bhussani. In these circumstances she set up a defence to say that she purchased a jama bearing a rental of Rs. 9-12-9. The learned special Judge said that it was unnecessary to decide the question of fact whether the land appertained to the jama of Rs. 9-12-9. The Assistant Settlement Officer having found the point in favour of the defendants and the landlord being desirous of contesting it before the Court the learned special Judge proceeded upon the footing that as Doshi Ghosain was brought on the record on 14th April 1923, the proceedings against her were out of time because she was not impleaded until after two months from the final publication of the Record-of-Rights. It does not seem to me that that view is consistent with the decision of this Court in the case of Bir Bikram Kishore v. Ambika Charan (1). There three Judges of this Court laid it down that when S. 105 (1), Beng. Ten. Act, speaks of an application it is not necessary for the landlord or the tenant, in making the application to name any person. It is only necessary to indicate the holdings in the record in respect of which a settlement of fair and equitable rent is sought. Accordingly there was a perfectly good application in this matter brought within the two months and, on the doctrine of that case, it appears to me that this matter ought to go back to the learned special Judge, the preliminary objection as to time being overruled, in order that he may decide the case upon its merits. The appellant is entitled to her costs of this appeal.

The next appeal is No 1161, and in this case it seems that the original defendant or tenant recorded in the Record-of-Rights was Danej Mia. One Jogendra Nath Ghosal was brought on the record by a petition filed after two months from the date of the final publication, namely, on 16th April 1923. It turned out that Danej Mia's interest had been sold at auction, the sale certificate being in May 1922, and possession is said to have been taken in April 1923. In this case, however, it appears that, although Jogendra Nath Ghosal's name had been substituted for Danej Mia on the application of the plaintiff, Jogendra was only one of several persons interested in the tenancy. Now, the matter was fought out to a finish in his presence and ultimately the application was dismissed on the ground that such an application must be brought against all the joint tenants. It does not seem to me to be right that in these circumstances this matter should be sent back in order that the other joint tenants should be impleaded. If the landlord went on against one only, then his advantage, such as it is, in being able to proceed under S 105, must come to an end. She must be left to take such steps by way of suit in civil Courts as she may be advised. In these circumstances, I think, this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

As regards appeal 1160: there, it appears, that the recorded tenant was one Nagendra Nath Mukerjee, but that by the time the final publication took place in November 1922, this man was dead for about two years. Then an application was made on 18th July 1923 to bring the present defendant on the record and that was refused because it was more than two months from the date of the final publication. The case seems to me to be governed by the decision of the case of Bir Bikram Kishore v. Ambika Charan (1), to which I have already referred. As regards this matter I think the appeal should be allowed, the decree of the lower appellate Court should be set aside and the case should be sent back to the Assistant Settlement Officer to proceed with the application against the proper parties. The appellant is entitled to her costs of this appeal.

B B Ghose, J—This appeal arises out of a suit brought against the defendant by the firm in the name and style of Budh Nath-Pyari Lal Das for recovery of Rs 21,562 2-0 alleged to have been lent to the defendant for which a promissory note was given by the defendant in favour of Pyari Lal Das, dated 21st January 1921. The defendant raised various pleas in his defence, but the question with which we are mainly concerned in this appeal is whether the suit has been properly brought by the plaintiff firm or, in other words, whether the plaintiff has the right to sue for the debt. Other defences were raised in the Court below, but Sir Provash, appearing for the defendant who is the appellant before us, has candidly stated to us that, upon the materials on the record, it would be difficult for him to attack the judgment of the Subordinate Judge on the other facts found by him against the defendant. The Subordinate Judge made a decree in favour of the plaintiff mainly upon this ground:

The Negotiable Instruments Act nowhere lays down that the real owner of the money lent to a person on a promissory note cannot sue its maker and get any money from him if his name be disclosed to the maker; it simply lays down that the holder of the document is entitled to get the money and give a discharge to the maker: even a benamidar or trustee, if he be the holder, can sue and get a decree. The right of the real owner is not affected by this Act, if his name be disclosed to the maker of the instrument and if the maker does not make any payment to the holder and get a discharge from him.

The learned advocate for the appellant raises two points in his appeal: the first is that the plaintiff firm was incompetent to maintain the suit, having regard to the provisions of S. 78, Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, read with S 8 of Act. Secondly, if the suit is considered to be based upon the consideration paid to the defendant, the suit is barred, having been brought more than three years after the time when the loan was advanced. Under the promissory note the loan was payable to Pyari Lal Das or to his order after thirty days from the date of its execution. The present suit was brought on the 16th February 1924. If the suit is considered to have been brought on the promissory note it is within time. But it is contended, on behalf of the appellant, that, if the suit is considered to have been brought for the original consideration, then it is barred by limitation. It is further urged on behalf of the appellant that, on a true reading of the plaint it must be held that the plaintiff did not bring the suit upon the original consideration, but based his claim only upon the promissory note. This last argument can hardly be advanced on appeal. It will appear that in the Court below issues were framed as regards the consideration. Issue 2 runs thus:

Did the plaintiff firm advance Rs 16,700 to defendant in the name of Rari Pyari Lal Das Bahadur as alleged in the plaint?

Issue 3 is this:

Can the plaintiff firm recover the amount in suit or any amount as alleged in the plaint?

From these issues it seems to me that it is quite clear that both the parties understood that the suit was based on the promissory note as well as on the original consideration paid to the defendant. The learned counsel for the respondent, Mr. Bose in answer to the first contention of the appellant that the suit is not maintainable because the holder of the promissory note has not sued, urges that, as a matter of fact, the holder of the note is one of the plaintiffs in the cause and the objection raised by the defendant is not maintainable. He also contends that the opinion of the Subordinate Judge, that the true owner of the money can also maintain the suit, is the correct view to take. Lastly, he urges that the suit upon the consideration is not barred by limitation.

The first point taken on behalf of the respondent by the learned counsel does not appear to have been dealt with in the Court below. But the point may be, shortly stated to be this. Although the plaintiff's name is described as the firm of Budh Nath Pyari Lal Das, as a matter of fact, all the members of the firm should be considered as plaintiffs in the cause. It is not disputed that Pyari Lal Das, the holder of the promissory note, is a member of the firm. As a matter of fact Pyari Lal Das has signed the plaint, on the allegation that he is a partner on behalf of the firm Budh Nath Pyari Lal Das and he has also verified the plaint himself. The question, therefore, resolves itself into this: Whether the plaintiff firm Budh Nath-Pyari Lal Das is a separate entity or a legal person different from Pyari Lal, or is it a comprehensive name for a number of persons, including Pyari Lal as a plaintiff. If the name of the firm is really the name of Pyari Lal with the addition of the names of certain other persons who are partners of the firm, then it is contended by the learned advocate that the holder of the promissory note is the plaintiff in the cause, and the fact that he has joined other persons with him in bringing the suit cannot defeat the suit. The only question would be, if we do not accept the second branch of his argument in support of the finding of the Subordinate Judge, that the decree requires to be slightly amended by making it only in favour of Pyari Lal Das. This argument requires to be properly examined. O 30, R. 1, sub-R. (1), Civil P. C., which is a new addition to the Code of 1908, runs thus:

Any two or more persons claiming or being liable as partners and carrying on business in British India may sue or be sued in the name of the firm.

It is unnecessary for me to recite the other portions of the rule. From this provision it appears to me that, if several persons who carry on a business as partners want to sue, the short method of describing them has been provided under this order. So far as I am aware it has not been considered that a partnership entered into by two or more persons is considered to be a legal person. As far as I have been able to find, that has not been considered to be so even in England, although the rule seems to be different in Scotland. Our attention has been drawn by the learned advocate for the respondent to the observations made by Lord Justice Lindley in the case of Western National Bank v Perez (1) which runs thus:

When a firm's name is used, it is only a convenient method for denoting those persons who compose the firm at the time when that name is used, and a plaintiff who sues partners in the name of their firm in truth sues them individually, just as much as if he had set out all their names.

Similar observations were made by Farwell, L. J., in the case of Sadler v. Whiteman (2), where the Lord Justice observes that when a firm is sued, all the members of the firm are to be considered as parties. Similar observations were also made in the case of Heinemann v Hale (3). It is contended on behalf of appellant that the observations which were made in those cases were with reference to different enactments and should not be applied to the present case. It is, no doubt, true that those observations were made with reference to different Acts, but the sole question is whether the firm is a separate personality as such and, in my judgment, the observations of the learned Judges familiar with the laws of partnership are of great assistance in arriving at a conclusion on the question. Those observations were followed in this Court by my learned brother Mr. Justice Page in the case of Seodoyal Khemka v. Joharmull Mannull (4). At p 558 the learned Judge observes:

A partnership under S. 239, Contract Act, is a relationship which subsists between persons; but a firm is not a person; it is not an entity; it is merely a collective name for the individuals who are members of the partnership. It is neither a legal entity, nor is it a person.

With this observation I entirely agree. Some of the authorities cited in support of this observation have been referred to by me already. That being so, assuming that the first contention raised on behalf of the appellant, that no suit is maintainable by any person other than the holder is sound, in my judgment the suit cannot be thrown out on the ground that the holder of the promissory note is not a plaintiff. As I have already stated, Pyari Lal Das is a partner, and along with him there are several other persons who are partners of the firm, and we may take this to be the fact that these persons were joined in their individual capacity in the suit along with Pyari Lal Das. Sir Provash, on behalf of the appellant, contends, that the firm is a separate entity in this particular case is a question of fact, because Pyari Lal Das in his evidence stated that he had got separate funds from his other partners. But this is not a question of fact. The names of the four persons who are partners of the firm may be taken to have been specifically stated in the plaint and all of them may be considered to have joined as plaintiffs.

This is sufficient for the purpose of deciding the case. But I think it is right that I should express my opinion with regard to the point which has been dealt with by the Subordinate Judge, as the question has been very elaborately argued by the learned advocates on both sides. It is contended, on behalf of the appellant, as I have already said, that S 78 read with S 8, Negotiable Instruments Act, bars any suit brought by a person other than the holder for the recovery of any money due on a promissory note. The learned advocate for the appellant has relied on certain cases. The first case which he refers to was Firm of Sadasuk Janki Das v. Kishan Pershad (5). That was a case in which the plaintiffs sued a person as defendant for recovery of a certain sum of money due on a promissory note on the allegation that the drawer was an agent for the defendant. That suit was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council as not maintainable. This is cited as an authority for the proposition that no person other than the one who appears as a party to the instrument is entitled to sue for the money. It seems to me that it is asking us to hold that the converse of the proposition laid down by their Lordships is true. I am not prepared to hold that.

The principle which has obviously been laid down is that, when credit is given to one person by the plaintiff, he cannot say that the credit is really given to another. Some other cases which have been cited by the appellant do not require any examination because they are really not in point with regard to the question now before us. That case, on which great stress was laid by the appellant, is the case of Subba Narayana Vathiyar v. Ramaswami Aiyar (6). The actual decision of the case itself is not in point. The question in that case was whether a defendant was entitled to give evidence to show that a promissory note executed by him was not really executed in favour of the plaintiff although he was the payee named in the note, in support of the plea that the note had been discharged by payment to the person really interested.

The learned Judges held that he was not so entitled and that is quite within the provisions of S 78, Negotiable Instruments Act, as it is enacted there that the payment of the amount due on a promissory note must, in order to discharge the maker or the acceptor, be made to the holder of the instrument. But the difficulty has been increased by the fact that the learned Judges made some observations with regard to the right of a person to bring a suit, who is not named therein as the holder. These observations appear at p [91 of 30 M.] of the report. The obiter dicta are entitled to the greatest respect as the learned Judges who composed the Bench were English lawyers dealing principally with what is taken to be English law. But the difficulty arises when the learned Judges give their reasons for their dicta that negotiable instruments were governed in this country as in England by the Law Merchant. I should have been very glad to follow the dictum in that case although it was obiter, if I were not of the opinion that, where I am not bound by authority, I must decide a point according to my own judgment, and with very great respect, I feel that the dicta do not commend themselves to me. The first thing that I have to observe is that the Law Merchant of England was never applied in the mofussil, while the Negotiable Instruments Act is so applicable; and in order to construe the Negotiable Instruments Act it would be travelling too far if we go to see what the Law Merchant was. The preamble to the Negotiable Instruments Act states distinctly that it is an Act for the purpose of defining and amending the law relating to promissory notes, bills of exchange and cheques. Therefore, I do not think that in order to construe the Act it would be proper for us to find out what the Law Merchant was before this Act was enacted. Such a procedure was disapproved by the House of Lords in the case of Bank of England v. Vagliano (7) and by the Privy Council in the case of Norendra Nath Sarcar v. Kamalbasini Dasi (8). We must, therefore, construe the Act as it stands. In my judgment the effect of S. 78 of the Act is this that it is not open to the defendant to plead that the holder of the instrument is not entitled to recover the money. If any third person sues the maker or acceptor of the promissory note, it would be a very good defence for him to say that he has been discharged by the holder of the instrument. Further, it would also be a very good defence to say that, unless the plaintiff in the suit gets him a discharge from the holder of the instrument, he is not bound to pay. But it would be going too far to say that that section prohibits any person other than the holder to bring a suit, if that person is the true owner. If that were the intention of the legislature, it seems that it would have been quite simple to state that: no person, except the holder, would be entitled to institute any suit on the instrument.

No such thing has been stated in any portion of the Act. Speaking of the procedure in England it is quite true that there are passages in text-books here and there that no person who is not a party to the instrument can be sued or "bring a suit." But I have not been able to find any authoritative decision in support of the statement contained in the books, that no such person can sue. The learned advocate for the appellant has stated to us that, although he endeavoured to find a decision to that effect in the English reports he has not been able to find any. But his argument is that it would appear from the text-books that that was the accepted view of law in England and, therefore, the draftsman of the Negotiable Instruments Act did not think it necessary to put the express prohibition in the Act itself. The surmise of the learned advocate may be true, but, whatever may be the law in England, I do not see any reason why we should construe the Act in the way proposed by the learned advocate and, as I have already stated, it will do no harm to any body, if the real owner is held to be entitled to sue if he is capable of giving a good discharge to the debtor from the holder of the instrument. In the present case, the holder of the instrument, Pyari Lal Das, has given evidence that the money belongs to all the members of the firm, and it has been found that the defendant was aware of it. He was willing to give a discharge to the defendant. It may be observed in this case that if Pyari Lal Das had taken the precaution of endorsing the instrument to the firm, there would have been no trouble. There is another case which I ought to refer to and which was cited on behalf of the appellant. It is the case of Reoti Lal v. Manna Kunwar (9). That case is directly in favour of the appellant's contention. In that case the real owner brought the suit on the allegation that the holder of the instrument was her benamidar who was dead at the time without leaving any heir. It was not possible for her to get any transfer from the holder. She brought the suit in her own name. The learned Judges held, reversing the decree of the lower Court, that the suit was not maintainable. The learned Judges professed to follow the observations in the case of Subla Narayana Vathiyar v. Ramaswami Aiyar (6), which I have already dealt with. No other reasons have been given except that S. 78, Negotiable Instruments Act, bars the suit. I have made my observation on the construction of the section, and, with great respect, I am unable to accept the conclusion of the learned Judges in that case. This contention on behalf of the appellant, therefore, fails.

Apart from what I have said with regard to the construction of S. 78 above, it may be observed that, where the suit is brought by the true owner and not by the holder of the instrument, the special rules of evidence contained in Ch. 13, Negotiable Instruments Act, would not evidently apply; and in this case the defendant was allowed to raise various pleas as to no receipt of consideration and so forth in his defence.

Lastly, I have to deal with the question whether the suit may be said to have been based upon the consideration advanced to the defendant. The learned advocate for the appellant contends that the plaint is ambiguous, but, as I have already pointed out, issues were raised in the Court below, from which it appears that the question was raised whether plaintiffs were entitled to claim the money advanced apart from the promissory note.

Next arises the question of limitation for such a suit. Mr. Bose, for the respondent, contends that in the plaint it is stated that the agreement was to pay the money after 30 days of its being advanced. This averment in the plaint has not been challenged by the defendant and, therefore, it must be taken to be an uncontroverted fact. That being so, the article of the Limitation Act which applies to the case is Art 115. Sir Provash, for the appellant, however, answers that in the plaint it is only stated that the agreement to pay after 30 days was contained in the promissory note. If the promissory note is wiped out, then there is no evidence in support of the allegation that that was that contract and, therefore, the cause of action accrued from the date of payment. Having regard to the fact, in my opinion, that the suit was also based on the consideration, it may be taken that the plaint mentions the agreement to pay after 30 days as a fact apart from the promissory note. That being so, Art 115, Lim. Act, would be applicable and the cause of action would accrue from the date of the breach. That is how this article has been construed in the case of Rameshwar Mandal v Ram Chand Roy (10), which has been followed in other cases.

The appeal, therefore, fails on all the points that have been raised and must be dismissed with costs.

Civil P. C., O. 6, R. 17—An amendment to strike out the name of defendant 1, who died subsequent to filing the suit, should be allowed.

The plaintiff brought a suit for partition and accounts and other reliefs against several persons. Defendant 1 was alleged to be primarily liable. But the plaintiff stated that defendant 1 was at the time of the plaint lying ill at Benares, according to his information, and he did not know whether he was alive or dead at the time and, therefore, as an additional precaution, the plaintiff had joined his heirs as defendants in the suit. Soon after the filing of the plaint, one of the heirs informed the Court that defendant 1 had died the day previous to the day the plaint was filed. Thereupon, the plaintiff asked for an amendment of the plaint by striking out the name of defendant 1 from the list of defendants and for putting in the name of defendant 1 in the body of the plaint wherever the words "defendant 1" occurred, but the Court rejected the application for striking out the name of defendant 1.

Held: that amendment should be allowed. As heirs were impleaded, the suit could not be held to have been brought as against a dead person. [P 152 C 1]

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is one of the most curious judgments I have come across in the course of my experience. The plaintiff brought a suit for partition and accounts and other reliefs against several persons. Defendant 1 was alleged to be primarily liable. But the plaintiff stated that defendant 1 was at the time of the plaint lying ill at Benares, according to his information, and he did not know whether he was alive or dead at the time, and, therefore, as an additional precaution, the plaintiff had joined his heirs as defendants in the suit. Soon after the filing of the plaint, one of the heirs informed the Court that defendant 1 had died the day previous to the day the plaint was filed Thereupon, the plaintiff asked for an amendment of the plaint by striking out the name of defendant 1 from the list of defendants and for putting in the name of defendant 1 in the body of the plaint wherever the words "defendant 1" occur. There were other prayers for amendment with which we are not concerned just now. The Subordinate Judge, by a curious method of reasoning, rejected the application for striking out the name of defendant 1 from the list of the names of defendants and putting in the full name of defendant 1 in the body of the plaint. His reasoning seems to have been that no suit can be brought against a dead person. This is quite true Defendants 2 to 6, however, were living persons against whom the suit had also been brought. Whether the suit was maintainable as against the heirs on the merits is a matter which requires decision. The Subordinate Judge did not want to decide it and threw away the case without hearing anything This procedure is regrettable The learned vakil for the respondents supports the order on the ground that the plaintiff wanted to make a new case by his petition for amendment. We are just now not concerned with what new case the plaintiff wanted to make We have only to deal with the order rejecting the plaint on the ground that the suit was brought against a dead person, while, as a matter of fact, it was not

We must, therefore, set aside the order of the Subordinate Judge and send back the case to the lower Court to be tried according to the provisions of the law. The cause title must be amended by striking out the name of Hari Mohan Dalal as defendant 1 and the plaint allowed to be amended by putting in the full name of Hari Mohan Dalal at every place where the words "defendant 1" occur, and such consequential amendments must also be allowed on account of this amendment being made; that is to say, instead of the relief claimed against Hari Mohan Dalal, the relief may be claimed against his heirs. Whether the heirs would be liable for any of the claims advanced in the plaint or not is a matter which is to be decided in the suit. He is wrong to say that the plaint should be rejected, because no cause of action is disclosed. The learned vakil for the respondents cannot say that there is no cause of action, because, it being a suit for partition and accounts, a cause of action is disclosed. Whether the bar of limitation can be seriously pleaded or not is a question which seems to be merely academical, because the suit was filed on 27th July 1925 and the application for amendment made on 29th August 1925. Whether any other amendment of the plaint should be allowed or not is left to the discretion of the Court. But the manner in which that question has been decided by the Court is disapproved by us.

The appellant is entitled to his costs of this appeal. We assess the hearing-fee at 30 gold mohurs.

Judgment.—This rule was issued on the opposite party to show cause why the order of the Subordinate Judge of Dacca, dated 17th February 1927, entertaining and allowing an appeal preferred by the opposite party from a decision of the Munsif of Dacca, dated 30th September 1926, should not be set aside.

It appears that the plaintiff, who is the petitioner before this Court, instituted a suit in the Court of the Munsif of Dacca for recovery of a certain sum as the price of trees which had been cut by the defendant. The defendant is plaintiff's tenant, and the plaintiff alleged that the defendant had, as such tenant, no right to cut away and misappropriate any tree without the permission of the plaintiff either under the local custom or under the law, and, as the defendant wrongfully and illegally cut away two hijal trees from the land, he was liable to pay compensation.

The Munsif decreed the plaintiff's suit and ordered that "the suit be decreed in part for Rs 5-2-6 with proportionate costs." The suit was valued at less than Rs. 100 and it is admitted that the Munsif who tried the suit was vested with powers of a Small Cause Court Judge to try cases up to the value of Rs. 100.

It is argued that the present suit was a suit of a Small Cause Court nature and, although the Munsif tried it under his ordinary jurisdiction, no appeal lay from the decision of the Munsif to the Subordinate Judge; and, in support of this contention, reliance is placed on a decision of the learned Chief Justice in the case of Mohani Mohan Ray v. Ramdas Paramhans (1). This position is not controverted by the learned vakil for the opposite party. The question, therefore, on which this rule turns is this: namely, whether on a true reading of the plaint it can be said that the suit was one which was exempted from the jurisdiction of the Court of Small Causes by reason of the provisions in Art. 35, Cl. (ii) Provincial Small Cause Courts Act, which excludes cases which fall under Ch. 17, I. P. C., from the cognizance of a Small Cause Court.

It appears to me, from the allegations in the plaint, that the allegations do not constitute mischief within the meaning of S. 426, which falls under Ch. 17, I. P. C. The dispute is between the landlord and a tenant, and the question as to whom the right to the trees, or the right to the timber when the trees are felled, belongs, is often a question of considerable difficulty. The tenant, for aught one knows, might bona fide believe that he was entitled to cut the trees, and if, under such bona fide belief, he cut the trees the provisions of Ch 17, I. P. C., would not be applicable to his act. I think, therefore, that the suit was one which was not excluded from the cognizance of the Court of Small Causes. That being so, no appeal lay to the Subordinate Judge.

The result is that the order of the Subordinate Judge is set aside and the decree of the Munsif is restored, but, in the circumstances of the present case, as no objection was taken to the competency of the appeal before the Subordinate Judge by the petitioner, he is not entitled to costs in this Court.

Judgment.—This appeal by defendant 2 arises out of a suit brought by the sub-mortgagee against the sub-mortgagor and the original mortgagor. Defendant 2 was the original mortgagor. The mortgage-bond is dated 27th February 1920, and was executed in favour of defendant 1. Defendant 1 sub-mortgaged his right to the plaintiff by a deed dated the 18th January 1921. The Subordinate Judge passed a decree in favour of the plaintiff. Defendant 2, in his appeal, takes the ground that neither the original mortgage-bond nor the sub-mortgage-bond was properly attested. With regard to the bond executed by the original mortgagee, the contention of the learned vakil for the appellant is untenable, because there is the evidence of one witness that the other witnesses also attested the document, and there was no cross-examination on the point. The argument with regard to the original mortgage-bond has more substance. Of the two witnesses, whose names appear as attesting witnesses, one was examined, viz, Mr. Sambhu Nath Banerjea. This gentleman was a vakil of this Court at the time when he attested the bond. He is now an advocate and a barrister-at-law. This gentleman stated in his cross-examination that Mr. Susil Chandra Sen, the other attesting witness, was not present when the document was executed and that the signature of Mr. Susil Sen was not made in his presence. With regard to his own attestation: he said that he was present at the time of the mortgage-bond, that he saw Radha Mohun Dutt put his signature on the mortgage-bond and that he attested it. From his evidence it is quite clear that Susil Chandra Sen was not present at the time when the mortgagor put his signature on the bond.

According to the definition of "attestation," as interpreted by the Privy Council in the case of Shambu Patter v. Abdul Kadir Rowthan (1), the attesting witness, in order to prove legal attestation of a document, must have seen the executant put his signature to the document and, in that view, it should have been held, as the appellant contends, that the document was not properly attested.

The learned Subordinate Judge, however, was of opinion that Mr. Sambhu Nath Banerjea, having given his evidence five years after the event, might not distinctly remember the details. That is quite possible. But the difficulty in supporting his judgment, on the ground the Subordinate Judge has stated, is that there is no other evidence on the record to prove proper attestation. The mortgagee even does not give his evidence that the other witness was present and had seen the execution. The Subordinate Judge further says that, when the mortgagor admits execution, the document should bind that person. The difficulty, again, in accepting this proposition is that the defendant 2, from the very outset, pleaded that the document was not properly attested. Under these circumstances the learned advocate for the original mortgagee, defendant 1, asked us to take the evidence of the other attesting witness, Mr. Susil Sen, who was then an attorney-at-law and acted on behalf of the mortgagee as a member of the firm of Messrs. Dutt and Sen. Mr. Susil Sen is also a vakil of this Court, and the learned advocate for defendant 1 requested us to examine this gentleman in furtherance of justice.

It was pointed out to us that that gentleman was present on several occasions in the Court below to give evidence, but, unfortunately, the Court had no time to take up this case on those dates which was adjourned from time to time. To the plaintiffs' misfortune, the case was taken up on a date when Susil Sen was unable to reach the Court. Apparently, because the presiding officer was in favour of the plaintiffs' contention, no application was made before the Judge to have an adjournment for the examination of Susil Sen. Under these circumstances, we felt inclined to examine this gentleman. But we are relieved from taking that course by reason of the new amendments of the Transfer of Property Act, which were pointed out to us by Babu Gour Mohun Dutt appearing on behalf of the plaintiff-respondent. These amendments are embodied in Acts 27 of 1926 and 10 of 1927. Act 27 of 1926 gives a new definition of the word "attested" by insertion of a clause in S. 3, T. P. Act, after the definition of the word "instrument." Shortly stated, it is this: the word "attested" means attested by two or more witnesses each of whom has seen the executant sign or has received from the executant a personal acknowledgment of his signature or mark, but it shall not be necessary that more than one of such witnesses shall have been present at the same time, and no particular form of attestation shall be necessary.

Babu Gour Mohun argues that this document was registered and the mortgagor acknowledged execution before the Sub-Registrar, and the endorsement of the Sub-Registrar to the document was to the effect that the execution was admitted by Radha Mohan Dutt who was identified by Sambhu Nath Banerjee, Vakil, High Court, Calcutta. Then follow the signatures of Radha Mohan Dutt, the mortgagor, and of Kripa Nath Dutt, District Registrar of Assurances. It is further argued by Babu Gour Mohun that this being the fact, we should hold, by reference to the cases cited on the question of proper attestation of wills, that the acknowledgment before the Sub-Registrar and the signature of the Sub-Registrar below the endorsement on the deed amount to sufficient attestation under the amended definition in Act 27 of 1926.

With regard to the question of wills: this has been held to be a proper attestation from a very early date: see the cases of Hurro Sundari Dabha v. Chunder Kant Bhattacharjee (2) and Amarendra Nath Chatterjee v. Kasi Nath Chatterjee (3). There was some difference of opinion between this Court and other High Courts as to whether this new Act 27 of 1926 applies to transactions which had taken place before the passing of the Act. A Division Bench of this Court seems to have been of opinion that it was not applicable to such transactions. A later Act, however, was passed, viz., Act 10 of 1927, which is described as an Act to amend certain enactments and to repeal certain other enactments. It has been enacted with regard to the Transfer of Property (Amendment) Act, 1926, that in S. 2 in the definition of the word "attested," after the word "means" the words "and shall be deemed always to have meant" shall be inserted. This leaves no doubt in the construction of the Act, that it should be applied to all transactions, however ancient they may be, to which the Transfer of Property Act itself is applicable. In that view, the contention raised by Babu Gour Mohun Dutt must be given effect to.

One point was urged by the learned advocate for the appellants, that the Sub-Registrar should have been examined in order to prove the attestation made by him. But that is not at all necessary, because we must take judicial notice of the endorsement of the Sub-Registrar and his signature. The next point urged is that both these amendments of the Transfer of Property Act came into operation after the judgment of the Subordinate Judge and should not, therefore, be applied to this case. This argument does not appear to be of any substance, because, even if the Subordinate Judge had dismissed the suit on the ground that there was no proper attestation, we should have been bound to give effect to the legislative definition of the word "attestation" although the Act was passed after the decree. The arguments raised on behalf of the appellants having failed, this appeal must be dismissed with costs. Costs of the appeal will be added to the mortgage-money of the plaintiff. Defendant 1, the original mortgagee, will bear his own costs in this Court.

Roy, J.—This appeal is by defendants 1 and 2 in the suit which has been decreed in the plaintiffs' favour by both the Courts below. The suit concerns a plot of homestead land belonging to defendant 6. The plaintiff obtained a nim howla patta from the latter, but on the next day the defendants took possession of the land and the plaintiff was obliged to bring this suit for khas possession and establishment of her title. The defendants resisted the suit on the ground that there was a prior contract of sale by virtue of which defendants 1—5 were put in possession. It appears that defendant 2 is also a mortgagee from the lessor. The lessor supported the defence. Both Courts came to the conclusion that the defence is untrue and decided the suit in the plaintiffs' favour. Defendants 1 and 2 have come up now on appeal to this Court. The learned vakil appearing for them contends, in the first place, that there being a subsisting mortgage no decree should have been passed without safeguarding the mortgagee's rights. There was no issue upon the mortgage and it does not appear that the mortgagee's rights are affected in any manner by this litigation.

The second ground taken turns upon the fact that in the settlement khatian the plot in dispute is recorded as half howla and half karsha. The contention is advanced that, in respect of a moiety share of the land, the plaintiff being an under-raiyat the lease given to her is invalid by reason of S 85, Ben. Ten. Act. The learned Subordinate Judge dealt with this contention very briefly. He said that the lease was granted in respect of homestead land and not agricultural land, and so this contention cannot prevail. It is argued that this view is wrong. Undoubtedly the land is homestead, and it does not appear that it is held as a part of any agricultural holding or that defendant 6 is even an agriculturist. If the statement in the judgment of the trial Court is correct the land has been homestead from before the permanent settlement. The Bengal Tenancy Act has no operation as regards homestead lands and the reference to S 85, Ben Ten Act, does not seem to be pertinent.

It is argued, however, that the plot having been recorded karsha or occupancy raiyati in eight annas the legal effect must follow. Various authorities were quoted. It was urged that the case of Manik Borai v Bani Charan Mondal (1), where it was said that the question of invalidity of the lease could be raised only by the landlord, proceeded on the question of estoppel and that the true position of an under-raiyati lease for over nine years as being wholly void was laid down in Jarip Khan v. Durfa Bewa (2), and that the defendants who are strangers can challenge the plaintiffs' title as being invalid. The matter has been set at rest now by the Full Bench case of Chandra Kanta Nath v. Amjad Ali Hazi (3). It was decided that when the lease, purporting to be of a permanent character, is granted by a person who, on the face of the document, confesses to have a higher status than that of a raiyat, the grantee may invoke the doctrine of estoppel. Here the plaintiff got a permanent lease. The grantor is estopped. The defendants claiming through the grantor are equally estopped. The question of invalidity of the lease may be raised by the landlord or a person claiming through him, or by some one who has a permanent title, but not by the grantor or anyone claiming through him. It was suggested that the defendants were strangers. They cannot have a better right than the raiyat himself. If the plaintiff can maintain the suit against the raiyat she has a right to the land and the defendants, who have no title whatever, cannot be allowed to remain on the land. It was contended on a reference to Harendra Lal v Hari Das Debti (4) that the parties committed a fraud on the registration office. That position was also discussed in the Full Bench case. If the parties knew all along the real character of the land, no question of estoppel would arise. That is not the case here. As was observed by Mookerjee, A C J., the question of the true nature of the tenancy is often a matter involved in doubt and uncertainty.

Defendant 6 has treated the homestead as his howla. It appears that an officer of the landlord was actually examined in this case, and he deposed that there were several maliks and some said that defendant 6's right was howla and some karsha and that is how the settlement record came to be framed. There is no question of a conspiracy of false recitals. The plea, therefore, is without substance and must fail. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

C got into possession of property in suit as tenant at a monthly rent. He was let into possession by G, an equitable mortgagee from father of S, in his capacity as a guardian of S, and paid rent. After some time C entered into an infructuous rental contract with G to purchase the property, but C did not pay the money as G could not execute any valid deed of transfer, and it was settled and agreed that instead of rent reasonable interest upon the sum should be paid by C. P, a vendee from S, brought a suit for rent and mesne profits against C.

Held (per B. B. Ghose, J.): that as G was in possession as a mortgagee, C, having been brought on the mortgaged property by G, had no privity between himself and the mortgagor so as to be liable to the mortgagor for his occupation of the mortgaged property. P being bound by the consent, given by or on behalf of the owner of the equity of redemption before his purchase, to the taking of possession by G, he cannot, on that ground, maintain his suit against C for damages or rent. [P 162 C 1, 2]

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal on behalf of the principal defendant, H. R. Chamaria & Co, who may shortly be described as Chamaria, against a judgment and decree of the Subordinate Judge, 2nd Court, Dacca dated 21st December 1925. The suit, as framed, was on the ground that Chamaria was a tenant-at-will under one J. B. Sukeas who was the owner of the property in question. The plaintiff had purchased the right, title and interest of the legal representative of J. B. Sukeas in execution of a money-decree on 2nd May 1919. He was put into symbolical possession by virtue of his purchase on 18th July 1919. The purchase was made in the benami of his son, named Bepin Behary Pal who was joined as defendant 2 in the suit. On 4th August 1919 the plaintiff served notice on Chamaria determining the tenancy under which Chamaria was alleged to have held the property in question as from the end of August 1919. The present suit was brought on 17th September 1919, and the claim was for rent at the rate of Rs. 600 per month from 2nd May to 31st August 1919, and for damages at a certain rate, which it is unnecessary to mention, from 1st September to 17th September 1919. The plaint was subsequently amended by an application made on 23rd January 1925, asking for mesne profits or damages up to the date of delivery of possession. By this amendment the original valuation of the suit, which was Rs. 10,000 odd, was increased to Rs. 80,000 odd. The defendant objected to the application for amendment which was overruled by the lower Court. The defendant's main defence was that he was never a tenant of the land under the plaintiff or his predecessor-in-interest, and the plaintiff has no right to maintain the suit against him. His case was that one J. C. Galstaun held an equitable mortgage or, as it may be properly described, as a mortgage by deposit of title-deeds, which was effected in the town of Calcutta under S. 59, T. P. Act, by J. B. Sukeas; and that Galstaun was in possession of the property in suit along with other properties as a mortgagee, and while in such possession Galstaun let out the property at first to a brother of J. B Sukeas and then to the defendant Chamaria at a rent of Rs. 600 per month. But some time in April 1918 an agreement was entered into between Galstaun and Chamaria that Chamaria would purchase the property in dispute for Rs. 85,000 and that he would have to pay no rent, but would have to pay interest on the purchase money agreed to between them. The sale^{*} could not be affected because Galstaun had no right to effect a sale of the property at the time. But the stipulation was that Galstaun would either take the permission of the Court to sell the property on behalf of the infant heir of J. B Sukeas, or he would himself effect the sale after purchasing the property in execution of the decree on his mortgage which he intended to have. On these pleadings several issues were framed in the lower Court. The main questions are covered by issues 3, 7 and 11. Issue 3 was:

Is there any relationship of landlord and tenant between the plaintiff and the defendant.

Issue 7 was:

Was the plaintiff aware of the equitable mortgage in favour of J. C. Galstaun at the time when he purchased the property in suit? If so, can he get khas possession without redeeming plaintiff's mortgage?

Issue 11 was:

Whether Mr. J. C. Galstaun is mortgagee in possession of the properties in suit. If so, whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover any amount by way of damages?

It should be stated here that the plaintiff did not, at the commencement, admit the mortgage of Galstaun. When the suit was brought by Galstaun on his mortgage the present plaintiff was joined as a defendant as he ought to have been joined as a purchaser of a portion of the equity of redemption. Galstaun's suit on his mortgage was brought on 14th May 1919, four months prior to the present suit by the plaintiff. The plaintiff disputed the mortgage and in that suit he took up a plea that Galstaun having got into possession of the property and having realized the profits, he was bound to account for the receipts, and those must be debited against the debt if any was found due to Galstaun. That suit was decided in the trial Court on 23rd September 1921. There was an appeal against that decision and this Court modified the decree of the Subordinate Judge by its judgment^{*} dated 23rd January 1924. I shall speak later on about this judgment. The judgment and decree of the High Court were affirmed by the Judicial Committee in January 1927: [vide A. I. R. 1927 P. C. 60—Ed.]

In the presesent case before the Subordinate Judge the trial proceeded upon the ground that Galstaun had a mortgage on the property in question. The sole question upon which the parties seem to have been in controversy was whether Galstaun was ever in possession of the property in question as a mortgagee, or, in other words, whether Galstaun's position was that of a mortgagee in possession. The Subordinate Judge found, as it was found in the previous litigation, that the purchase of the plaintiff was with notice of Galstaun's mortgage. The Subordinate Judge found in the present case in deciding issue 7, as stated above, that Galstaun took possession of the property as guardian of the infant son of J. B Sukeas and did not take possession as a mortgagee. That being so, he held with regard to issue 7, that the brother of J. B Sukeas was a tenant of Owen Sukeas, the infant son of the original mortgagor, when Galstaun let out the property to him and that Chamaria was similarly a tenant under Owen Sukeas when Chamaria was let into possession by Galstaun in his capacity of guardian of Owen Sukeas. In that view it was held that the plaintiff, as a purchaser of the right, title and interest of Owen Sukeas stepped into his shoes and thus Chamaria became a tenant under the plaintiff, and that tenancy was terminated at the end of August 1919, by notice to quit which was served by the plaintiff upon Chamaria, and upon that basis the plaintiff was entitled to a decree for rent for the period of the tenancy and also for damages by way of mesne profits till the date of delivery of possession. The property however, was sold in execution of the mortgage decree obtained by Galstaun on 23rd October 1925, and purchased by himself. The value fetched for the property at the execution sale was far below the amount of the mortgage decree. By reason of that sale no decree could have been made by the Subordinate Judge for ejectment of the defendant, as the plaintiff's title to the property ceased to exist by virtue of that sale. But he made a decree for damages up to that date and the total amount of the decree made by the Subordinate Judge, who modified the claim for damages made by the plaintiff to a considerable extent, was Rs 46,660. The defendant Chamaria has appealed to this Court.

The first ground taken on behalf of the appellant is that the amendment asked for by the plaintiff should not have been allowed by the lower Court. We do not think that there is any substance in this objection. If the plaintiff had not specified in his plaint that he asked for mesne profits till the date of the suit, that is to say, till 17th September 1919, the Court might have been in a position to make a decree for mesne profits up to the date of delivery of possession. But, if the suit is otherwise properly framed, there was no harm in allowing the plaintiff to amend his plaint by striking out from his prayer for recovery of mesne profits the words "up to the date of the suit" and by substituting in their place the words "up to the date of delivery of possession."

The appellant then takes up the position that he was brought on the land by the mortgagee Galstaun who was in possession at the time, and that so long as the possession of Galstaun could not be got rid of, the plaintiff was not entitled to sue him as there was no privity between him and the plaintiff. As I have already stated Chamaria never acknowledged that he was on the land as tenant of Sukeas. Galstaun's possession was not admitted by the plaintiff in this suit either in the plaint or in the evidence on his side. The Subordinate Judge, however, has found that Galstaun was in possession. But he has held that as Galstaun was in possession as a guardian of Owen Sukeas the relationship of landlord and tenant existed between Owen Sukeas and the defendant. The question, therefore, is whether that position is at all maintainable. The learned vakil, on behalf of the plaintiff-respondent, does not seek to support the decree of the Subordinate Judge on that ground. The position that he takes up is this: that Galstaun got into possession without any right. His position was that of a mere trespasser and Chamaria, who was brought on the land by Galstaun, was in no better position. They were joint trespassers upon the facts as established by the evidence. That being so, the plaintiff was entitled to claim damages from any one of them, both of whom were jointly and severally liable. So long as it is not established that the plaintiff has recovered any damage from the other joint trespasser the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages from this tortfeasor, that is, Chamaria; and upon that ground the decree of the Subordinate Judge is unassailable.

The appellant, on the other hand, contends that Galstaun was in possession as a mortgagee. He brought a suit on his mortgage. In that suit he admitted, in his plaint, as would appear from a recital in the judgment of the Subordinate Judge in the mortgage suit (at p. 42 of the second part of the paper-book), that he had obtained possession of the mortgaged properties and some moveables belonging to J. B. Sukeas, after the death of J. B. Sukeas. He had sold some of the moveables and realized the rents and profits of the mortgaged properties and credited the price and rent and profits towards the satisfaction of his debt. He took upon himself the liability to account as a mortgagee in possession. The present plaintiff was defendant 3 in the previous mortgage suit, who practically alone contested the suit. He also referred to the fact that Galstaun had taken possession of the property left by J. B. Sukeas and that he was bound to account for all the moneys that he had received, (which the present plaintiff described as misappropriation) and also to make good the amount of the loss which he had caused by his neglect to get in any part of the property of the deceased. In substance the present plaintiff, as a defendant in the mortgage suit, pleaded that not only Galstaun was liable to account for what he had actually received or might have received, but he was also liable to account for his wilful default. Upon that an issue was framed as to how much was realized, and that was the sixth issue before the Subordinate Judge in the mortgage suit. Galstaun produced his account books in the mortgage suit. What the receipts were is evident from the fact which was stated in the judgment of the Subordinate Judge (at p. 58 of the same part of the paper-book) where the Judge stated:

The plaintiff, it is true, credited in his accounts the moneys received from the estate of J. B. Sukeas after his death and these should be held as payments made in reduction of the plaintiff's dues.

It should be stated that the decree made by the Subordinate Judge was merely a money decree as against the representative of the original debtor, J. B. Sukeas, and the sums which were found in the accounts to have been realized from the property by Galstaun were debited against his dues.

Against that decree Galstaun appealed to the High Court, and in the High Court the decree of the Subordinate Judge was modified to this extent that a decree was made in favour of Galstaun as a mortgagee and he was held entitled to recover his dues from the mortgaged property. With regard to the accounts: it appears that neither party pressed for an account being taken and a decree which in ordinary case is made to the effect that accounts should be taken of what was due to the mortgagee by taking accounts of what was due under the bond and what was received by the mortgagee from the mortgaged properties, was not made. Instead of that a decree was made for the sum that was found by the lower Court with interest and costs. The reason evidently seems to have been that both the parties knew that the receipts were less than the interest and outgoings and that on taking accounts the dues of the mortgagee would be found to have been much larger than what was found by the Subordinate Judge, and the mortgaged property not being of sufficient value it would be mere waste of time and money to take further accounts which would have the effect of increasing the debt which was found to be due to the mortgagee. There was an appeal from the decision of the High Court to the Privy Council by the present plaintiff. The judgment and decree of the High Court were affirmed by the Privy Council on the 21st January 1927.* No objection was made in that appeal to the accounts nor to the nature of the decree that was made by the High Court. The only ground upon which the present plaintiff chose to fight the case before the Privy Council was whether there was a mortgage or not. The position of the parties, therefore, stands thus: that if there was a mortgage the equity of redemption purchased by the plaintiff was worth nothing as the mortgage-debt of Galstaun would far exceed the value of the property in whichever way the accounts might have been taken.

It is contended on behalf of the appellant that it is quite clear from the facts that Galstaun was in possession as a mortgagee. That being so, Chamaria had been brought on the land by the mortgagee in possession, and the plaintiff as a purchaser of the equity of redemption could not treat Chamaria as his tenant so long as the property was not redeemed by him. It is conceded on the part of the respondent that if Galstaun was a mortgagee in possession, and if Chamaria was brought on the property by Galstaun as such mortgagee, the plaintiff would have no case. But his contention is that Galstaun never took possession as a mortgagee and that contention is sought to be supported by the fact that the plaint was not drawn up in the mortgage suit in the form which is prescribed in Appendix A, form No 45, Civil P. C., for a plaintiff by a mortgagee who had entered into possession; and the decree is not also in the form given in Appendix D, Civil P. C. I have already stated why the decree was not in that form. The plaint, although it is not precisely in the form prescribed in Appendix A sufficiently indicates the position of Galstaun. When he stated in his plaint that he had a mortgage and that after the death of the original mortgagor he got into possession of the property and realized rents and profits which he was willing to debit against the mortgage amount, this is a sufficient statement that the mortgagee was liable to account as mortgagee in possession and I have already indicated the defence in which it was alleged that the mortgagee was not only bound to account for what he received, or what he might have received, but also to account for the loss to the estate by his default. Under the circumstances it seems to me difficult to hold that the position of Galstaun was anything but that of a mortgagee in possession. The Subordinate Judge has held that Galstaun went into possession as a guardian. It is undoubtedly true, as it appears from the record, that, after the death of J. B. Sukeas, who had himself written a pencil note before his death to the effect that Galstaun should look after his minor son, Galstaun thought that he would act as a sort of a guardian of the minor son of J. B. Sukeas as Galstaun seems to have been very much interested in the welfare of the family. With that view he took possession of not only the mortgaged property, but also some movable properties belonging to Sukeas and tried to carry on his business. It is apparent that when he found that the debts of the estate of Sukeas were so great that it would be hopeless to try to save the estate, he ceased from acting as a sort of guardian of the infant. Subsequently, a lady, who was the grandmother of Owen Sukeas, took out letters of administration of the estate of J. B. Sukeas. Galstaun was certainly not entitled to enter into possession under his mortgage. But it is quite clear that he got into possession either with the express or tacit consent of the persons who were really interested in the estate of the mortgagor, J. B. Sukeas. This question does not seem to have been properly investigated and that must have been due to the fact that the plaintiff altogether ignored the existence of Galstaun with reference to this property in the present litigation. It appears quite clear from the evidence on the record that Galstaun entered into possession peacefully and without objection on the part of the persons interested in the mortgaged property. That being so, he cannot be treated as a wrongdoer, as he is sought to be treated by the respondent here and unless the plaintiff can maintain the position that Galstaun was a wrongdoer and Chamaria was equally a wrongdoer the present suit cannot in my opinion be maintained as against Chamaria.

It is contended on behalf of the respondent that there is nothing to show that Chamaria paid any money to Galstaun for the period of his occupation or that any sum which he might have paid was taken into account in the mortgage suit and, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the money from Chamaria for the period of his occupation. We are not concerned in this case, in my judgment, with the question whether proper accounting was made in the mortgage suit of Galstaun. That question does not arise in the present case. The short question which seems to arise here is that, if Galstaun was in possession as a mortgagee and was accountable as such in his mortgage suit, any person who has been brought on the mortgaged property by Galstaun has no privity between himself and the mortgagor so as to be liable to the mortgagor for his occupation of the mortgaged property. It may be conceded that the plaintiff, after his purchase of the equity of redemption could, by giving proper notice to Galstaun, claim to recover possession of the property. In other words, he might withdraw by notice to Galstaun the consent that was either actually or tacitly given by his predecessor-in-interest to the taking of possession by Galstaun; but it is unnecessary to discuss what the position would have been in that case as there is no allegation anywhere on the record that any such notice was given. The plaintiff was, therefore, bound by the consent given by or on behalf of the owner of the equity of redemption before his purchase to the taking of possession by Galstaun and he cannot on that ground maintain this suit against the defendant for damages or rent.

There is another matter with regard to which I propose to make a few observations. The discussion by the learned Subordinate Judge in his judgment as regards the question whether Galstaun was a mortgagee in possession or not is based upon a discussion in the books as to whether the mortgagee should in certain cases be treated as having taken upon himself the onerous position of a mortgagee in possession. When a mortgagee enters into possession he is bound to account as a mortgagee in possession. But owing to the exceptional severity with which a mortgagee in possession is treated in taking accounts the Courts are slow to decide that such possession has been taken, and will only do so when it is proved that the mortgagee had no reasonable ground for believing himself entitled to take the rents and profits in any other capacity. The mortgagee may relieve himself of the liability to account as a mortgagee in possession by showing that he entered into possession in some other character. If he fails to establish that fact in order to exonerate himself from the liability to account as a mortgagee in possession, he is held to be accountable as much; for example, in this case if in the mortgage suit Galstaun had taken up the position that he did not enter into possession as a mortgagee but simply as guardian of Owen Sukeas, I think his plea could not have been given effect to. He was not the legal guardian of Owen Sukeas and, therefore, as there is no other legal ground, which he could maintain for being in possession of the property he would be liable to account as a mortgagee in possession. My view, therefore, is that Chamaria may shelter himself under the plea that Galstaun took possession of the property as a mortgagee after the death of J. B. Sukeas and that he was brought on the land by Galstaun.

There was no relationship of landlord and tenant between him and the plaintiff and the plaintiff, therefore, is not entitled to claim anything from him. The plaintiff purchased the equity of redemption which unquestionably was worth nothing and he is not, in my judgment entitled, to recover anything from Chamaria.

In that view this appeal must be allowed and the suit dismissed with costs in all Courts.

Page, J.—I agree. This is a suit brought to recover khas possession of certain immovable property together with arrears of rent and mesne profits. The property in suit was the subject-matter of an equitable mortgage of 22nd May 1914, created by one J. B. Sukeas in favour of J. G. Galstaun.

It was common ground at the hearing of the appeal that even if the sums decreed for rent and mesne profits in the suit had been added to the mortgage security it would have been insufficient to meet the sum due to Galstaun under the mortgage of 22nd May 1914. The ground upon which the decree was based is set out in the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge as follows :

Defendant 1 (that is appellant) got into possession admittedly as tenant at a monthly rent of Rs. 60). They were let into possession by Mr Galstaun in his capacity as a guardian of Owen Sukeas in 1917, and they paid rent as they had agreed to pay for a period of one year. In March or April 1918 they entered into an infructuous verbal contract with Mr. Galstaun to purchase the property for Rs. 85,000, but they did not pay the money as Mr. Galstaun could not execute any valid deed of transfer and it was settled and agreed that reasonable interest upon the sum of Rs. 85,000 should be paid by H. R. Chamaria & Co. As there was no sale the interest payable, as mentioned above, was really the rent payable for the property and thus the tenancy created at first was practically continued. The relationship of landlord and tenant, therefore, in my opinion, existed as between Owen Sukeas and defendant 1 till the interest of Owen Sukeas was purchased by the plaintiff on the 2nd May 1919 in the be name of his son, defendant 2, in auction sale. On purchase of the equity of redemption the plaintiff stepped into the shoes of Owen Sukeas and thus H. R. Chamaria & Co. became tenants under him. The tenancy terminated with the end of August 1919 as it was put an end to by a notice to quit.

It is quite clear that Galstaun could not legally enter into an agreement for a tenancy with H. R. Chamaria & Co. in the capacity either of guardian or of agent of the minor son of Sukeas. It follows, therefore, that the suit, as framed must fail, for no privity of estate at any time existed between the plaintiff and Chamaria. At the hearing of the appeal, however, the learned vakil for the respondent contended that, although he could not support the decree upon the ground upon which it was based by the learned Subordinate Judge, it ought to be affirmed upon an entirely different basis. He urged that Chamaria must have been in possession of the property at all material times either without any title or claiming title through the mortgagor or the mortgagee.

As the learned vakil for the appellant admitted that he could not claim title through the mortgagor Chamaria either had no title to be in possession at all or he must rest his claim to be in possession upon the title of Galstaun, the mortgagee. Upon that assumption the learned vakil for the respondent further contended that Galstaun took possession without any pretence of legal right and was liable to be ejected as a trespasser; and that Chamaria, who admittedly was put into possession by Galstaun acting in some capacity or other, was in a like predicament. Being trespassers both Galstaun and Chamaria were jointly and severally liable to pay damages for having been in wrongful possession of the property.

That is a different cause of action, involving the consideration of entirely different issues, from the cause of action that was set out in the plaint and canvassed at the trial, and learned counsel who appeared for the appellant strenuously contended that the Court ought not to permit the respondent to set up a new cause of action of this nature for the first time in appeal. It is necessary to decide that question, because, in my opinion, upon the evidence, the learned Subordinate Judge ought to have held that at all material times Galstaun was in possession of the property in suit as mortgagee and not as a trespasser. The oral evidence upon this matter, in my opinion, supported the view that Galstaun took possession of this property as mortgagee with the assent of the mortgagor. That being so, his possession was lawful possession unless and until the assent of the mortgagor to Galstaun remaining in possession of the mortgaged property was withdrawn. At the hearing of the suit no allegation was made, no issue was raised, and no evidence was led by the plaintiff to prove that any time after he purchased the property the plaintiff had refused or withdrawn his assent to Galstaun remaining in possession of the property as mortgagee under the mortgage of 12th May 1914. It may be that if such an issue had been raised at the trial the defendant might have been in a position to prove that the plaintiff in fact consented to Galstaun remaining in possession as mortgagee. But once it is found that Galstaun took possession of the property as mortgagee with the assent of the mortgagor, in my opinion, the mortgagee's possession continued to be lawful possession until the assent of the mortgagor was withdrawn; and if Galstaun's possession was lawful possession it follows that Chamuria's possession was also lawful.

The result is, therefore, that, even assuming that the respondent ought to be allowed at this stage of the proceedings to put forward the case that Chamuria was a trespasser, such a contention must fail having regard to the evidence that has been adduced. It is unnecessary to consider the legal position of the plaintiff vis-a-vis the mortgagee Galstaun, and I refrain from expressing any opinion with respect to the legal obligation that existed or may exist between them.

For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be allowed and the suit dismissed.

Judgment.—This is an appeal by Hari Chaitanya Sinha Chowdhury who was appointed an executor of the will of his father Govinda Sundar Sinha Choudhuri against two orders of the District Judge of Berhampore, one dated the 29th August 1925, and the other dated the 12th September 1925. The facts shortly stated are these: Govinda died leaving four sons and his widow. He had five sons: (1) Hare Krishna who had pre-deceased him leaving a widow Chittasakhi and two sons Gopi Ballav and Rudha Ballav, (2) Hare Ram, (3) Ram Ram, (4) Hari Chaitanya and (5) Hare Hare who was a minor at the time of his death. The testator appointed five persons as executors of his will. The ninth paragraph of the will runs thus:

In order to carry on the work according to the terms of this will, I appoint my sons Sriman Hare Ram Sinha Choudhuri Sriman Ram Ram Sinha Choudhuri, Sriman Hari Chaitanya Sinha Choudhuri and on behalf of my minor grandsons, Gopi Ballav and Radha Ballav, their mother Chittasakhi Dassy and on behalf of my minor son Hare Hare Sinha Choudhuri, my wife Srimati Krishna Kamini Choudhuri, these five persons, as the executors of my will.

Probate was taken of the will by Ram Ram and Hari Chaitanya. The order for probate was dated 7th August 1920, but the probate was not issued until the 21st April 1923. Hare Ram, the second son of the testator renounced his executorship. The two ladies Chittasakhi and Krishna Kamini did not apply for probate. On the 22nd December 1923, Hare Hare, the minor son of the testator and one of his grandsons Gopi Ballav who had attained majority applied for grant of probate. Subsequently, Radha Ballav attained majority and he also apparently applied for probate of the will of his grandfather. In the meantime, an application was made by some persons interested in the property of Govinda for appointment of what has been called a "common manager" under para. 10 of the will which provides that if there is any difference of opinion among the executors and for certain other reasons, the District Judge will appoint a fit person among the sons and grandsons of the testator as common manager according to law for the management of the estate.

The District Judge by his order of the 29th August appointed Ram Ram Sinha Choudhuri one of the executors who had obtained probate as common manager of the estate of the deceased under the terms of the will. By his other order of the 12th September, he appointed the three applicants Hare Hare Sinha Choudhuri, Gopi Ballav and Radha Ballav as executors. The contention on behalf of the appellant is that these three persons cannot be appointed as executors under the terms of the will. It is urged that their mothers were appointed executors and these persons were not so appointed and, therefore, the learned Judge was wrong in granting probate to them. On behalf of these persons, it is urged by Mr. Bose that these minors were appointed executors by implication and what the testator meant was that during the minority of those persons, their mothers would act as executors; otherwise there would be no meaning in the expression used by the testator that Chittasakhi would be the executor on behalf of the minor grandsons Gopi Ballav and Radha Ballav and Krishna Kamini would be the executor on behalf of the minor Hare Hare Sinha Choudhuri.

It is contended that although the language is not according to the legal formula, the real intention of the testator was that these minors were really to be executors but during their minority, their mothers would act on their behalf. It appears to us that this argument is quite sustainable. That being so, there is nothing wrong in making a grant to these persons by the order of the District Judge. Under S. 7, Probate and Administration Act corresponding to S. 222 (2), Indian Succession Act of 1925, an executor can be appointed by necessary implication, and we think that, in this particular case, the minors were appointed executors by necessary implication. If that is so, there is nothing wrong in the order of the learned Judge in making the order of grant of probate to the son of the testator, Hare Hare and his grandsons Gopi Ballav and Radha Ballav. This may be done under S. 224, Indian Succession Act of 1925, corresponding to S. 9, Probate and Administration Act. The illustration shows that in such a case probate may be granted at different times. The appeal, therefore, with regard to that order is dismissed.

The order of the 29th August 1925, stands on a different footing. Nothing has been shown to us on behalf of the common manager appointed, Ram Ram Sinha Choudhuri, by Babu Brojo Lal which authorizes the Court to make such an order as it has done. No doubt attempt has been made to bring this order within the provision of grants for limited purposes and it was argued that when a grant was made for a limited purpose either as regards the duration of time or for some other purpose, the grant expires on the happening of the event. Similarly, where the testator has made directions that, under certain circumstances, a common manager should be appointed by the Judge, by analogy it should be held that the previous grant made to Ram Ram and Hari Chaitanya jointly has come to an end; and that being so, the lower Court was competent to appoint another person as executor. It does not matter if the name has been given as "common manager."

The real substance is that Ram Ram has been appointed the sole executor and the other executor Hari Chaitanya has either been removed or has ceased to hold the office by reason of the events that have happened. It is very difficult to accept that contention. The District Judge has not removed any executor. On the other hand, he has granted probate to three other persons nominated by the testator. There were, therefore, five executors to whom probate has been granted. The grant has not been recalled with respect to any of them. The argument, therefore, that Ram Ram is now the sole executor must fail. The order of the District Judge dated the 28th August 1925, appointing Ram Ram as common manager must, accordingly, be set aside. The learned District Judge probably thought that he had the power to appoint a common manager according to the direction in the will. But the Judge could only exercise jurisdiction under the provisions of the statute. If the executors are guilty of anything for which they are liable to be removed, the parties must take the proper procedure for that purpose.

The result, therefore, is that this appeal is allowed in part and dismissed with regard to the rest. Respondents 2 to 4 will obtain their costs of this appeal from the appellant. Hearing-fee: five gold mohurs.

The appellant will get his costs as against respondent 1, Ram Ram. Hearing-fee: five gold mohurs. Respondent 5 will bear his own costs of this appeal.

Appeals Nos 416 to 419 of 1925, Decided on 15th July 1927, from appellate decree of District Judge, Khulna, D/- 4th November 1924.

Landlord and Tenant—Rent payable partly in kind and partly in cash—Market price of grain fixed in patta—Suit for rent—Landlord is not entitled to value paddy at current rate but at rate fixed in the patta.

After stating that the rent will be payable in cash and in paddy the patta provided that if for an unavoidable reason tenant was unable to pay the paddy its market price at the rate of Rs. 4 per pali should be paid. The amount fixed was Rs. 34-5-0. The total price of the paddy together with road and public works cesses amounting to Rs. 50 were to be paid according to certain kists. In a suit for rent landlord claimed market price prevailing on the date of the suit for non-delivery of paddy.

Held, that the landlord was not entitled to claim the value of paddy at its market price but at its price stated in the patta.

Held, further that the fact that no unavoidable reason was pleaded was quite immaterial because it was too vague for any Court of justice to take cognizance of. [P 167 C 1]

Judgment—These four appeals arise out of four suits for rent. The only question in controversy is whether, according to the terms of the patta by which rent was payable partly in cash and partly in kind by delivering a certain quantity of paddy, for non-delivery of the paddy, the present market price should be recovered by the plaintiff or the price stated in the patta. After stating that the rent will be payable in cash and in paddy, the words in the patta are to this effect:

If for an unavoidable reason you are unable to pay the paddy its market price at the rate of Rs. 4 per pali should be paid. The amount is Rs. 34-5-0. The total price of the paddy together with road and public works cesses amounting to Rs. 50 should be paid according to the kists given below and you will take a receipt after payment of the money.

Then it follows:

Except on the ground that all the lands of the mahal lay fallow, you shall not pay the price of the paddy.

Then follow the other provisions which it is unnecessary to mention. At the end of the document the kists are given. It is stated that the cash rent is Rs. 15-11-0 and the price of paddy is Rs. 34-5-0 making a total of Rs. 50. Lastly, different kists are given in which the amount of Rs. 50 was to be paid. The Munsif gave a decree to the plaintiff according to the price of paddy fixed in the patta, that is to say Rs. 34-5-0. The District Judge reversed that decision and gave the plaintiff a decree at the rate claimed, viz., the present market price of the paddy. On appeal by the defendants it is contended on their behalf that, having regard to the terms in the patta, they are not bound to pay more than the price of the paddy stated in that document. It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff-respondent that that price was fixed in the happening of one event only, that is, if for any unavoidable reason the tenant was unable to pay the value stated instead of the paddy if the whole of the land remained fallow; otherwise, the plaintiff is entitled to get the present market value of the paddy. Upon reading the entire patta we are unable to agree with the District Judge and to accept the contention on behalf of the respondent. Even if it be considered to be a suit for damages, the amount of damages is mentioned in the deed itself. That being so, we cannot say that the amount should be in lieu of the paddy at one rate if the tenant cannot deliver the paddy for any unavoidable reason and at a different rate for any other reason which the Court does not consider to be unavoidable. The question that no unavoidable reason was pleaded seems to us to be quite immaterial because it is too vague for any Court of justice to take cognizance of. The defendant may say "I am too poor" or other things may be said in support of his inability to pay. These are matters which cannot be taken into consideration. Where, as a matter of fact, the landlord has chosen to fix the price and stated the kists in which the rent is to be paid on that basis, it must be considered that at the time the landlord thought that the highest amount that should be realized on account of the paddy was fixed under the contract. If by some chance the price of the paddy has increased subsequently, it does not seem to be right that this contract is to be given the go-by by giving the present market price to the plaintiff. In this view, the decree of the Subordinate Judge must be set aside and that of the Munsif restored with proportionate costs in both the Courts.

This judgment will govern all the four appeals.

Appeal No. 171 of 1924, Decided on 21st July 1927, from decree of 1st Sub-Judge, Barisal (Bakarganj), D/- 24th January 1924.

* (a) Civil P. C., O. 34, Rr. 5 and 6—Appeal from preliminary decree after passing of final decree is maintainable.

Under the Civil Procedure Code (1908) a preliminary decree has an independent existence and by the appeal against the final decree one cannot attack the preliminary decree. The final decree is really dependent upon the preliminary decree, and if there is no appeal from the final decree but the preliminary decree is set aside on appeal, the final decree will necessarily fall to the ground. [P 167 C 2]

(b) Civil P. C., O. 41, R 2—Memorandum of appeal from preliminary decree can be amended to cover final decree.

Court has power to amend the memorandum of appeal from preliminary decree, so that it will be an appeal both as against the final decree as well as against the preliminary decree in a mortgage suit: A. I. R. 1921 Cal. 109, Foll. [P 168 C 1]

B. B. Ghose, J.—A preliminary objection has been taken on behalf of the plaintiffs-respondents that this appeal is incompetent. The appeal is against the preliminary decree passed on a mortgage, dated the 24th January 1924. The final decree was made on 28th February 1924. The appeal against the preliminary decree was filed on 27th May 1924. It is, therefore, contended that having regard to some of the cases decided in this Court, this appeal is incompetent. Personally I am of opinion that the cases which have been decided after the passing of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1908 have not laid down the correct rule. Under this Code, a preliminary decree has an independent existence and by the appeal against the final decree one cannot attack the preliminary decree. The case was different under the old Code. What is now a preliminary decree was supposed to be a preliminary order and the final decree was held to absorb that order and by an appeal against the final decree that order might have been challenged. It was, therefore, held under the old Code that after the passing of the final decree in the case, the preliminary order had no separate existence, and, therefore, the appeal against that order was incompetent after the passing of the final decree. That reasoning, however, does not apply when the law is that you cannot challenge a preliminary decree by an appeal against the final decree. A preliminary decree is now an independent decree which is not absorbed by the final decree. The final decree is really dependent upon the preliminary decree, and if there is no appeal from the final decree, but the preliminary decree is set aside on appeal, the final decree will necessarily fall to the ground. The mischief of the procedure suggested by the learned advocate for the respondents is this : There may be a very good ground for appeal against the preliminary decree, but there may be absolutely no ground for appeal as against the final decree which merely works out the directions made in the preliminary decree. To compel a party to appeal against the final decree against which there is no ground whatsoever to urge in order that his appeal against the preliminary decree may be heard seems to me to amount to a farce. Mr. Sen very rightly recognizes that position, but he relies upon the decided cases of this Court. I may say that the other High Courts have not followed this practice. I would have thought it necessary to have this question referred to a Full Bench for final decision if the appellants had not taken steps which they have taken in this case and which do not compel me to make such reference. The steps that they have taken are that they have made an application after the filing of their appeal to be allowed to amend their memorandum of appeal so as to make it also an appeal against the final decree. This procedure was suggested by the case of Kulada Prosad Chowdhury v. Ramanand Patnaik (1). We grant the application made on behalf of the appellants. Let the memorandum of appeal be so amended that it would be an appeal both as against the final decree as well as against the preliminary decree. Now we propose to deal with the merits.

The only point urged before us in the appeal was a question of limitation. Defendants 5 to 10 and 25 were alleged to have obtained the interest in the mortgaged property under a paramount title, that is to say, they had purchased in execution of a mortgage prior to that of the plaintiffs. But in the previous suit brought by the prior mortgagee the present mortgagees who were puisne mortgagees, were not made parties. Thereupon the right of the plaintiffs as puisne mortgagees to redeem the prior mortgage was left intact. Although defendant 25 was impleaded in the suit long after the plaintiff's suit as against the mortgagors was barred by limitation, still the plaintiff's right to redeem defendant 25 was not barred. Therefore, the question of limitation as between the plaintiffs and the appealing defendants does not arise.

There is, however, a very small point with regard to the amount of money which the appealing defendants were held by the Court below to be entitled to on a sale of the mortgaged property. There is no objection by either party as to the form of the decree. The Court below has ordered the sale of all the properties mortgaged to the plaintiff and has allowed the appealing defendants a first charge on the purchase money for the amount of their mortgage debt under the previous mortgage bond. In working out that sum the appellants have been allowed somewhat less than what they might have been entitled to. The Subordinate Judge has only given them a decree for the amount which was sued for in the plaint. But under the decree in their mortgage suit the defendants were allowed interest at the bond rate of Re 1-8-0 till the date of redemption which was fixed for the 24th August 1913. The appellants are, therefore, entitled to the interest up to that date on the amount sued for plus the costs and after that date interest on the whole at 6 per cent per annum till the date of sale which was the 22nd May 1915. This sum has been worked out by the learned vakils for both the parties agreeing to the figure as Rs 2,400. The decree of the Subordinate Judge must, therefore, be varied to this extent : that defendants 5 to 10 and 25 will get Rs 2,400 out of the money realized by sale of the mortgaged properties prior to the plaintiffs in this case getting anything out of it.

With this modification this appeal is dismissed. There will be no order as to costs in this appeal.

This, however, will not preclude the appealing defendants or any other defendants from redeeming the plaintiffs' mortgage as directed by the decree of the Subordinate Judge, dated the 24th January 1924.

*Mohan Majamdar—for RespondentsCuming, J.—In the suit out of which this appeal has arisen the plaintiffs who are the appellants in this Court sought to enhance the rent of some 17 tenants.
These persons were holding separate lands separately under the landlords. They sought to enhance the rent first on the ground of rise in the price of the staple food-crops, and secondly, they asked for additional rent for additional area on the ground that the tenants were holding more lands than what had been settled with them. What practically amounts to 17 suits have been tried together as a single suit. The inconvenience of this procedure is only too obvious and it is quite possible that the plaintiffs have suffered from having adopted this procedure. Bethat as it may, the law allows this procedure to be adopted, and the plaintiffs having deliberately adopted this procedure can hardly now complain.The Assistant Settlement Officer dismissed the suit on both grounds. He would seem to hold that the jamas were mokarrari ones being held at a fixed rate of rent from the time of the permanent settlement and also that the landlords had failed to prove that there had been any increase in the area. The landlords-plaintiffs appealed to the District Judge.
With regard to what I may describe as 4 khatians, namely, Nos. 14, 18, 21 and 32 he decreed the appeal so far as it concerned the claim to enhancement of rent on the ground of rise in the price of the staple food-crops. With regard to the claim for additional rent for additional area he dismissed the appeal as regards these khatian numbers also. With regard to the other 13 khatians he dismissed the appeal.The plaintiffs have appealed to this Court. They contend that as regards khatians Nos. 16, 24 and 19 it is quite clear from the construction of the kabuliyats that these kabuliyats are not confirmatory as held by the learned District Judge and they further argue with regard to all the khatians that the lower appellate Court was wrong in holding that the landlords having failed to prove the original area on which the present rent was based had failed to prove that there had been any increase in area. They would seem to contend that there were certain kabuliyats and in these kabuliyats certain areas were stated and these kabuliyats formed the basis of the contract, that it must be taken that the area as given in these kabuliyats was the amount of lands for which the defendants agreed to pay the rent mentioned in the kabuliyat and, therefore, it was sufficient for them to show that the present area was much larger than the area given in these kabuliyats. The simple answer to this contention is this: the landlords in order to succeed in showing that there had been an increase in area were bound to prove what was the area of the tenancy at the time of its inception. This is the principle laid down in the case of Rajkumar Pratab Sahay v. Ram Lal Singh (1). The kabuliyats in these cases do not really form the contract on which the tenancies are based. They are really only confirmatory of the former contract and nothing more. It cannot, therefore, be said that the defendants having agreed in these kabuliyats to pay so much rent for a certain area stated in these kabuliyats it would be sufficient for the landlords to show that the present area varies from that area. As I have stated these kabuliyats being only confirmatory and not the original contract, it is necessary for the landlords to show as is laid down in the case of Rajkumar Pratab Sahay v. Ram Lal Singh (1) what was the area at the inception of the tenancy. We are not prepared to interfere with the finding of the learned Judge on this point that the landlords having failed to prove what the original area was on which the present rent was based they were not entitled to additional rent for additional area.

The learned vakil for the appellants has then specifically argued with regard to khatians Nos. 16, 24 and 19, and he argues that on proper construction of the kabuliyat in khatian No. 16, there has been a change of rent. In this kabuliyat it is stated that the original rent was Rs. 29-4-0, and that the defendant now pays Rs. 29, four annas being kept in suspense or hajat. In other words the rent is nearly the same, namely, Rs. 29-4-0. Four annas out of this rent is kept in suspense and it is open to the landlord at any time to insist upon the payment of this four annas. In other words, the rent is Rs. 29-4-0. There is really no change in the rate of rent in this khatian. This kabuliyat, therefore, does not prove that there has been any change in the rate of rent so far as khatian No. 16 is concerned.

With regard to khatian No. 24 the position would appear to be this: the landlords purchased it at a rent sale and after the sale he resettled the land with the same tenant. The learned vakil argues that in this case there has been a break in the continuity of the tenancy, that although the land was settled again with the same tenant he cannot be considered as successor-in-interest of himself. There has been a break because his present tenancy is a new tenancy although it has been settled with the same tenant at the same rate of rent. This contention, we think, is sound. It is quite clear that the landlords having purchased it at a rent sale were entitled to the khas possession of the tenancy of the former tenant. It was open to them to have settled it at any rate they chose. In our view this constitutes a new tenancy, and the presumption under S. 50, Ben Ten Act does not apply. As regards khatian No. 24 the appeal will be decreed, and the case will be remanded to the Court of first instance to determine how much, if any, increase the landlords are entitled to for the rise in the price of the staple food crops.

With regard to khatian No. 19 the position would appear to be this. The original holder sold or transferred a half of his tenancy. The landlord recognized the transferee as his tenant. It seems to us that in this case a new tenancy was created and, therefore, presumption under S. 50, Ben Ten Act, does not apply and the landlords in this case are entitled to an increase on the ground of rise in the price of the staple food crops. Khatian No. 19, therefore, must be remanded to the Court of first instance to be determined how much, if any, increase of rent the landlords are entitled to for rise in the price of the staple-food crops. The appeal with regard to khatians Nos. 19 and 24 is decreed and the costs will abide the result. Hearing-fee one gold mohur.

The appeal with regard to the other khatian numbers will stand dismissed with costs. Hearing-fee three gold mohurs.

Appeal No. 642 of 1926 is not pressed and is dismissed with costs. Hearing-fee one gold mohur.

Appeal No. 1336 of 1924, Decided on 11th July 1927, from appellate decree of Dist. J., Nadia, D/- 24th March 1924.

(a) Railways Act, S. 72—Risk-note signed by sender of goods is binding on the consignor—

Signing one's own name with addition of agent for company. is signing within the meaning of the section.

When a person tenders the goods to the Railway Company, he has, so far as any question of contract with the railway for carriage is concerned, power under the statute to sign the risk-note so as to bind the consignor.

Where a person signs not merely his own name but his own name with the addition of agent for a company then the risk-note is signed by the person delivering the goods within the meaning of the section. [P 172 C 2, P 173 C 1]

(b) Railways Act, S. 72—Packages not delivered in good condition—Plea that they were in good condition will not be allowed—Evidence Act, S. 114.

If at the time of booking, the Railway Company is dissatisfied and the person delivering the goods for carriage agrees that the condition of the packages is not satisfactory, it cannot afterwards be made matter of objection in a suit upon the contract that the packages were in good condition.

(c) Contract Act, S. 24—Contract cannot be accepted as to part.

A person cannot hold to a part of a contract and reject the rest unless there is statutory authority for so doing.

(d) Railways Act, S. 72—Risk-note B signed by an illiterate person—Contract is complete—It is not duty of Railway Company to see literacy or otherwise of sender of goods.

If a person being illiterate signs a contract thinking it to be of a different character altogether from what it is in fact, or if any misrepresentation is made to him as to what he is signing, then no doubt the signature will not be binding on him, but it is quite wrong to suppose that it is the legal duty of a Railway Company to see whether the person delivering the goods is ignorant or not or to see that he reads and understands before he signs.

If a consignor who can read sends an illiterate person to deliver goods to a railway administration and that person signs the contract, the contract so signed by that person is binding on the consignor as though he has signed it himself: Kriley v. Great Western Railway (1863) 18 L. T. 658, Foll.

It is for the sender if he is not satisfied of his competence to give him instructions or assistance. It is quite wrong to treat a Railway Company in a case of this kind as though it were dealing with a pardanashin woman and taking a transfer of her estate, or as a person in a fiduciary relation to the consignor of the goods.

Surendra Nath Guha and Sisir Kumar Ghosal—for Appellants.

Provas Chandra Mitter, Ambikapada Choudhuri and Jotindra Mohan Choudhuri—for Respondents.

Rankin, C. J.—This is the defendants' appeal in a suit brought by consignees of goods which were dispatched by the defendants' railway from the Victoria Terminus in Bombay to Kushtea a station on the E. B. Railway. Two consignments of yarn are involved in the case. These goods had been sent out from England and were consigned from Bombay to Kushtea without being repacked. It appears that the yarn was contained in wooden cases and these wooden cases had gunny coverings as to which there is certain evidence that the coverings were old and torn. On the arrival of the goods at Kushtea, it was found that, as regards the first consignment, certain of the goods were damaged and that, as regards the second consignment, certain of the goods were damaged and certain parts of the contents had been lost.

The firm of Mr. P. N. Mehta & Co. were sending these goods to the plaintiffs. P. N. Mehta & Co. had a manager or managing director Mr. Parekh. It is quite clear that when the carters brought the goods to the railway station, some person in charge of the goods employed an individual called Gangaram Punaji to act as mucedam, that is to say, to be the forwarding agent dispatching the goods on the railway. The consignor-defendants say that the mucedam whom they were in the habit of employing was another individual altogether and they say that they gave no authority to anyone to get Gangaram Punaji to do any work for them. It is no way explained how the carter or foreman came to employ Gangaram Punaji or owing to what circumstances or under what instructions Gangaram Punaji was employed: but it is quite clear that he was the person who, in fact, delivered these goods for carriage to the defendants' railway. When he did so deliver the goods, the Railway Company took the view that the cases were damaged and defective. Gangaram Punaji agreed and signed the risk-note in form A. As regards the second consignment, risk notes both in form A and form B were signed by Gangaram Punaji. So far as the risk note B is concerned, it is clear that the rate of freight would be less; so far as the risk note in form A is concerned, it does not appear that the rate of freight would be less, though in such circumstances the consideration for which Risk-note A is executed is that it obviates the expense of putting the packages into proper condition before consignment and also that the sender gains in the matter of weight upon which freight has to be charged. In this case, what happened was that these goods were damaged in the process of carriage and the suit was brought against the several railways concerned in the carriage. Ultimately, it has been decreed against the appellant Railway, only the G. I. P. Ry. Co., which was the railway to whom the goods were handed over.

The first question which arises is this. It is said that Gangaram Punaji had no authority from the consignor and that his signature does not bind the consignor. It is said, secondly, that he was a man who could not read English and that it is not shown whether he knew what he was signing. As regards the Risk-note A, it is said that the learned Judge has found as a fact that the goods were in proper packing cases, that there was no defect in the packing, and that the defendant Railway can therefore take no advantage from the risk-note in Form A.

These questions turn upon S. 72, Indian Railways Act (9 of 1890). By that Act, the responsibility of a railway company is prima facie the responsibility of a bailee under Ss 152 and 161, Indian Contract Act, but agreement may be made limiting that responsibility and:

an agreement purporting to limit that responsibility shall, in so far as it purports to effect such limitation, be void, unless it is in writing signed by or on behalf of the person sending or delivering to the railway administration the animals or goods, and is otherwise in a form approved by the Governor General in Council.

The phrase, "the person sending or delivering to the railway administration" is an important phrase in the Indian Railways Act. It appears in more than one section in one form or another. Its equivalent is to be found in S. 58 and also in Ss. 73 and 75. As a matter of fact, it would appear that the phrase is taken from S. 7, English Railway and Canal Traffic Act 1854 where the words of the last proviso are :

Unless the same be signed by him or by the person delivering such animals, articles, goods or things respectively for carriage.

Now, it is quite clear that a railway company, when goods are tendered to it for carriage, cannot hold an inquest as to the right of the person delivering to deal with the goods, the property in the goods, the authority given by the owner to the person presenting the articles for carriage; and when one comes across the phrase

"the person sending or delivering to the railway administration" it is clear that this fact is being recognized by the statute. Under the same words in England, no difficulty has apparently been found. I find in English textbooks that this matter is treated as clear upon the fact of S. 7 of the Act of 1854. I find, for instance in Disney's Law of Carriage by Railway, 6th Edn. at p 37 :

The consignor, therefore, may be bound not only by the signature of himself or his agent, but also by the signature of the person who delivers the goods to the Company whether, in fact, that person had authority to sign or not.

In Alan Leslie's Law of Transport by Railway, the matter is put thus :

The section further provides that the contract may be signed not merely by "the party" but also by "the person delivering (the goods) for carriage." Such person has, therefore, not merely such authority to bind the sender as naturally arises from his position as agent, but an absolute statutory authority to bind him, and it seems that, prima facie, he has authority to sign any form of contract.

The English cases in which this matter has been more specifically dealt with are three in number. Kirby v. G. W. Ry. Co. (1), Foreman v. G. W. Ry. Co. (2), and Aldridge v. G. W. Ry. Co. (3). There can, therefore, be no doubt that when Gangaram Punaji tendered these goods to the Railway Company he had, so far as any question of contract with the Railway for carriage is concerned, power under the statute to sign the risk-notes so as to bind the consignor. If, of course, the question were not a question upon a contract of bailment or affreightment, but this suit were a suit by a person claiming in detinue or trover against the railway company for having in possession goods belonging to the plaintiff without his authorization, different principles would apply. That is not the nature of this suit which is a suit on the contract by the consignees.

The next question is this : It is said that because Gangaram Punaji signed not merely his own name, but his own name with the addition of "agent for P. N. Mehta & Co." that vitiates the contract. I am of opinion that there is no reasonable ground for this contention. The risk-notes in this case were signed by the person delivering the goods within the meaning of the section.

So far as regards risk-note A, there is a finding by the learned Judge that "the cases were in perfect good sound condition when they were booked." It does not seem to me that the learned Judge has found that with regard to the coverings as distinct from the cases, but it must be reasonably clear that, if, at the time of booking, the railway company was dissatisfied and the person delivering the goods for carriage agreed that the condition of the packages was not satisfactory, it cannot afterwards be made matter of objections in a suit upon the contract that the packages were in good condition. A person cannot hold to a part of a contract and reject the rest unless there is statutory authority for so doing. In this particular case what have to be applied are the terms of Cl. (b), sub-S. (2), S. 72, Indian Railways Act. The contract has to be otherwise in a "form approved by the Governor-General in Council." In this case, the contract was in such a form. Whether any of the authorized forms are to be used, and if so, which is a matter left by the statute to the parties. In my judgment, it is not open in a suit of this kind to reject the terms of the risk-note in the manner which is contended for.

The learned Judge, in dealing with this case, has committed himself to a certain amount of advice to railway companies and to a statement of the law which cannot in my opinion be accepted. Apart from holding that the railway company have to prove the authority of the person delivering the goods, he has gone on to say that the company must satisfy the Court that the person who signed it knew the terms of the contract and that the contract should be explained to him. He admits that this may be inconvenient, but thinks it necessary in law, when a contract is entered into by an ignorant person. The learned Judge in this respect is entirely mistaken. It is well held in England and the rule is the same in India that, if a person being illiterate signs a contract thinking it to be of a different character altogether from what it is in fact or if any misrepresentation is made to him as to what he is signing then no doubt the signature will not be binding on him; but it is quite wrong to suppose that it is the legal duty of a railway company goods is ignorant or not or to see that he reads and understands before he signs.

It has been held in England that, if a consignor who can read sends an illiterate person to deliver goods to a railway administration and that person signs the contract, the contract so signed by that person is binding on the consignor as though he has signed it himself: Kirley v. Great Western Railway (1). Apart from the question of authority to sign, the ordinary law of the land is applicable to a case of this kind and a very good statement of it can be found in Pollock and Mulla's Contract Act, in the notes to S. 13. Ignorant people are very commonly sent to deliver certain classes of goods and animals for transit by railway, e. g., grooms, drovers, carters. It is for the sender, if he is not satisfied of their competence, to give them instructions or assistance. It is quite wrong to treat a railway company, in a case of this kind, as though it were dealing with a pardanashin woman and taking a transfer of her estate, or as a person in a fiduciary relation to the consignor of the goods. In the present case Gangaram was professing to be a forwarding agent and might well be very familiar with railway forms in the vernacular translation.

The only other question that seems to call for observation is whether or not it is open to the defendants now to maintain that the plaintiffs have not proved under risk-note B, that the goods which were not delivered were lost. In my judgment, that is not open in this case because it is evident particularly from the judgment of the trial Court that it was in no way in dispute: indeed it could not well be in dispute that the goods which were short delivered having fallen out of damaged cases were goods lost: and the appellants on this point cannot be allowed to make a new case. In my judgment, the appeal should be allowed and the suit should be dismissed with costs in all the Courts as against the defendants-appellants. As regards the other defendants, the judgment of the learned District Judge will stand.

Mitter, J.—I agree.

Sailesh Chandra Ghosh and others—Defendants—Opposite Parties.

Civil Rule No. 695 of 1927, Decided on 15th August 1927, against order of Sub-Judge, 3rd Court, 24-Parganas (Alipur), D/- 25th March 1927.

Civil P. C., S. 115—Valid partial award—Refusal of Court to pass decree on partial award—Order is interlocutory—Revision does not lie—(Cuming, J., dissenting. Roy, J.)

In the exercise of a Court's jurisdiction to decide a question of law or fact wrongly is not to refuse to exercise a jurisdiction or to exercise it with material irregularity. [P 175 C 1, 2]

Certain arbitrators who were authorized to make a separate award from time to time in a partition suit made an award regarding suit properties. The parties objected to the arbitrators' award. The arbitrators then refused to have anything more to do with them and the remaining properties which also formed part of the subject of the partition suit were not therefore dealt with by the arbitrators. The award being only a partial award trial Court did not pass decree on it. One of the parties applied to the High Court for revision of this order.

Held: the Judge had jurisdiction to pass an order refusing a decree on a partial award; the High Court has no power to interfere under S. 115. (Roy, J. dissenting.) [P 174 C 2, P 175 C 2]

If the parties agreed to abide by the decision of the arbitrators in respect of the whole of the dispute and if the arbitrators had power to make a partial award from time to time the award which they actually made must be effective and cannot be set aside by refusing to pass a decree on it and a decree ought to have followed on the award already made. Great hardship would result to the parties if they were asked to wait until the whole suit was finally decided. In such cases High Court has power to interfere with interlocutory orders.

Atul Chandra Gupta and Indu Prokash Chatterjee—for Petitioner.Bankim Chandra Mukherjee, B. K. Mukherjee, N. N. Bose, Manindra Kumar Bose and Jatindra N. Guha—for Opposite Parties.Cuming, J.—The facts of the case out of which this rule has arisen are these:

The opposite party instituted a suit for partition in the Court of the Subordinate Judge at Alipur, sometime in 1921. A preliminary decree was made in August 1921, a commissioner was appointed and a final decree was passed on 20th February 1923. On an application for a review being made this decree was set aside and a fresh partition was ordered. The parties then agreed to refer all the disputes in the suit to arbitration. Sir Provash Mitter and his brother Sir Benode undertook this duty. It was agreed that the arbitrators might make separate awards from time to time.

They made an award regarding the Calcutta properties. The parties as usual in these cases began to file various objections to the arbitrators' award. The arbitrators then refused to have anything more to do with them and the remaining properties which also formed part of the subject of the partition suit have not been dealt with by the arbitrators. The Court held that the award being only a partial award it could pass no decree on it. The Court, therefore, set aside the award and ordered the parties to take the necessary steps. The petitioner then moved this Court and obtained this rule. His contention is that a decree can be made on a separate award and that hence the Judge in refusing to make a decree on the separate award has refused to exercise a jurisdiction vested in him by law.

So far as the present matter is concerned it is no doubt an interlocutory order in the suit and the view I have always taken is this, that such an order cannot form subject of revision under S. 115, Civil P. C. It is not, however, necessary to discuss this question because whether or not an interlocutory order can form the subject of S. 115, Civil P. C., I am quite satisfied that the present matter, whether interlocutory or final order, cannot form the subject of an application under S. 115. The argument put forward is this that the Judge wrongly decided that he could not pass a decree on a partial award. Hence he refused to exercise a jurisdiction vested in him by law, and so the matter comes within the provision of S. 115. If this argument be accepted, as far as I can see, every error of law or fact can be converted or perverted into the subject of revision under S. 115.

I will give a few instances.

A Judge wrongly refused to admit a certain document in evidence holding that it was inadmissible in evidence. The document was admissible in evidence so the Court has jurisdiction to admit the document and as the result of wrongly deciding the document inadmissible he refused to exercise a jurisdiction vested in him by law. Or the Judge held wrongly that a suit was barred by the principle of res judicata and so would not take any further evidence and he dismissed the suit. Had he decided rightly that the suit was not barred by the principle of res judicata he would have taken evidence in it and, therefore, by wrongly deciding that the suit was barred by the principle of res judicata he refused to exercise a jurisdiction vested in him by law which was to take evidence and make a decree in favour of the plaintiff.

It is unnecessary to multiply instances. There would be no difficulty if once this principle were accepted in extending it to errors of fact. A Judge wrongly decides a question of fact and decrees a suit in favour of plaintiff. Had he decided it properly he would have given a decree in favour of defendant. Hence he did not exercise a jurisdiction vested in him by law which was to give a decree in favour of defendant on account of his error of fact. In other words, every error of law or fact would be a refusal to exercise a jurisdiction not vested in the Court. This seems to me to be merely a perversion of the word "jurisdiction." "Jurisdiction means" "the power of deciding." In the present case admittedly the Judge had the power to deal with or decide the case before him which was a partition suit within his territorial and pecuniary jurisdiction. In exercising the power of decision he held that a decree could not be given on a partial award because he held the parties agreed to refer all matters to arbitration and did not agree to abide by the decision of the arbitrators if they decided only some and not all of the matters in dispute. He might be wrong and possibly he could have granted a decree on a partial award and he might have been mistaken as to what the agreement of the parties was in reference to arbitration. A number of rulings have been cited to show that he can. It is unnecessary for me to determine whether he can or cannot. It might be an error of law that he wrongly held he could not give a decree on a partial award or possibly an error of fact that the parties really agreed to have decision on some of the matters in dispute and did not require that all the matters should be decided by the arbitrators. But in the exercise of a Court's jurisdiction to decide a question of law or fact wrongly is not to refuse to exercise a jurisdiction or to exercise it with material irregularity. As the Privy Council has pointed out in Amir Hassan Khan v. Sheo Bakhsh Singh (1) where a Court has jurisdiction to decide a case and does decide it whether it decides it rightly or wrongly it is immaterial. If it decided wrongly it did not exercise its jurisdiction illegally or with material irregularity. In that case the present contention was not put forward that such exercise really amounted to a refusal to exercise its jurisdiction. It was only argued in that case that the Judge had acted with material irregularity. The present contention amounts to this that the Court by exercising its jurisdiction or power of decision wrongly refused to exercise its jurisdiction or power of deciding. In other words that to exercise jurisdiction is not to exercise jurisdiction. It is unnecessary to further pursue the argument.

In the present case the Judge had jurisdiction and he exercised it and held that he could not pass a decree on a partial award. He might be wrong but that would not give this Court power to interfere under S. 115.

I may here refer to the case of Kali Charan v. Sarat Chunder (2) a case which in many respects is very nearly akin to the present case. Further if the Court had the power to interfere under S. 115 this is not a case in which the Court should interfere. The Judge has not finally decided the case. It is still open to the parties to ask for fresh arbitration if they so desire or to leave the case to be decided in the ordinary way. Further I may point out that when the case is finally decided it could still be made a ground of appeal that the Court should have accepted the award. I would therefore, discharge this rule. The rule is discharged with costs. Hearing-fee ten gold mohurs.

Roy, J.—I regret to say that I differ from my learned brother in this matter. As my opinion cannot make any difference in the result of the case I will only indicate my reasons very briefly:

There was a preliminary decree in this partition suit and the parties thereafter agreed to refer the matter to arbitration

(1) [1885] 11 Cal. 6=11 I. A. 237=4 Sar. 55 (P. C.).

(2) [1903] 30 Cal. 97=7 C. W. N. 545.

The arbitrators were given powers to give their award separately from time to time and it was agreed that Calcutta properties should be divided first by the arbitrators. They divided the Calcutta properties and gave an award in respect of these properties. On account of certain circumstances the arbitrators refused to proceed any further with the partition. The learned Subordinate Judge has set aside this award in respect of the Calcutta properties and directed a commissioner to make a fresh partition. The contention of the petitioner is that the order of the Subordinate Judge is in so far as it deals with the properties not dealt with by the arbitrators is good and the order in respect of the properties dealt with by the arbitrators is bad and should be set aside and that a decree should be made on the basis of the arbitrators' award. A question has arisen whether we can interfere with the learned Subordinate Judge's order in revision. The cases of Rudra Prasad v. Mathura Prasad (3) and Chimanbhai Kalyanbhai v. Keshavlal Bulkhardas (4) amongst others were referred to where the learned Judges refused to interfere with the order setting aside the arbitration. These decisions appear to have proceeded from the point of view that the order of the lower Court was only an interlocutory order.

It has been pointed out, however, by the learned advocate for the petitioners that Piggot, J., who was a party in the Full Bench case of Buddhoo Lal v. Meera Ram (5), interfered with an order wrongly superseding an arbitration in Husain Baksh v. Lachhman Das (6). On the other hand, the learned advocate for the opposite party has referred to a decision of Maclean, C. J., in Kali Charan Sirdar v. Sarat Chunder Chowdhry (2), where the learned Judge refused to interfere with an order of the Small Cause Court in respect of an arbitration matter. It might be said that the last case was governed by the facts of that case. The Calcutta High Court seems to have taken ordinarily a view different from those of the High Courts of Bombay and Allahabad as to the meaning of the word "case" in S. 115, Civil P. C., and has interfered in revision in many cases. Some of these cases have been collected or mentioned in the case of Salam Chand v. Bhagawan Das (7). The ground taken in these cases seems to have been that where there is likely to be grave injustice or injury this Court should interfere even with interlocutory orders and other orders from which there is no appeal. Several of these cases are mentioned in Salam Chand v. Bhagawan Das (7). In this particular case it is urged that the error in law of the Subordinate Judge has led him to assume a jurisdiction which he did not possess and the cases of Lachmi Narayan v. Balmakund (8), Birj Mohan v. Rai Uma Nath (9) and Umed Mal v. Chand Mal (10) have been referred to as examples where similar errors have been corrected. It is contended by the learned advocate for the opposite party that the arbitrators had power to make partial award, but it is contended that the parties did not say that they would be bound by such partial award and the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge is a finding of fact with which we cannot interfere.

It seems to me that the case must be decided on the construction of the terms of the reference which was made in the case. If the parties agreed to abide by the decision of the arbitrators in respect of the whole of the dispute and if the arbitrators had power to make partial award from time to time the award which they actually made must be effective and cannot be set aside in that way and a decree should follow on the award already made. It would seem to me that great hardship would result to the parties if they are asked to wait until the whole suit which began in 1921—and which may still be prolonged for a considerable time—is finally decided and then to raise any debateable question by way of appeal against the final decision. With all due respect to my learned brother I would say that this is a case in which we should interfere on the ground that the learned Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to deal with the properties in respect of which there had been effective award.

COSTELLO, J.

John Carapiet Galstaun—Plaintiff.

v.

Diana Sarkies—Defendant.

Application No. 1365 of 1926, Decided on 11th July 1927.

Calcutta High Court Rules, Ch. 13, R. 17—leave to cross-examine deponents was granted.

An order was taken out in originating summons upon the executrix under a will calling upon her to treat the plaintiff as secured creditor. The objection was that a suit is necessary for the purpose. It was argued that the matter should be set down for deponent's cross-examination.

Held: that the case should be set down for cross-examination. [P 177 C 1]

S. C. Mitter—for Plaintiff.

W. W. K. Page—for Defendant.

Facts.—The plaintiff, J. C. Galstaun took out an originating summons to obtain an order on Mrs. Sarkies executrix of Mr. C. M. Sarkies, to treat him as a secured creditor of the estate. Defendants dispute the plaintiff's debt and affidavits were filed on both sides.

Mr. W. W. K. Page (for the defendants) contended inter alia that the matter could not be decided on an originating summons and that the plaintiff must bring a suit for this purpose (30 Ch. D. 291). Counsel further argued that the property involved was at Dacca, where the suit must be filed.

Mr. S. C. Mitter (for the plaintiff) argued that the matter ought to be set down for cross-examination of deponents under R 17, Ch 13 of the Rules of High Court (1873 W. N. 186). Counsel further contended the relief prayed for was a relief in personam. Probate of the will was granted by the High Court.

His Lordships adjourned the matter into Court and said that he would allow the deponents to be cross-examined.

Judgment. This originating summons is transferred to the list of suits for hearing. Order for mutual discovery within a fortnight. Inspection thereafter. The matter to appear on the Warning List C a month hence. The issues for determination are to be settled at the hearing.

Leave given to call evidence other than that of the deponents and to reserve the question of jurisdiction.

Appeal No. 437 of 1926, Decided on 1st June 1927, from appellate order of Dist. Judge, 24-Parganas, D/- 5th May 1926.

(a) Contract Act, S. 135—Surety to pay decretal amount after contest in Court—Suit compromised and decree obtained—Surety is discharged.

Graham, J.—This is an appeal against an order of the Second Additional District Judge of 24-Parganas reversing an order of the Munsif, First Court, Sealdah, and it arises out of certain execution proceedings. The facts shortly are as follows: The plaintiff-respondent brought a suit claiming a sum of Rs. 775 and attached certain cattle and moveables belonging to the defendants before judgment. One Ilahi Bux, who has since died and is represented by the appellant in this appeal, stood surety for any moneys which might be decreed in the suit, and thereupon the cattle and moveables, which had been brought to the Court, were released from attachment. Thereafter the suit was taken up and partly heard. The parties then agreed upon a reference to arbitration and the chairman of the Tollygunge Municipality was appointed arbitrator. The result of that arbitration was that the arbitrator awarded a sum of Rs 400. The defendant filed an objection which was heard but the Court ultimately accepted the award and decreed the suit accordingly. The decree-holder then applied for execution of the decree and asked for a certificate of non-satisfaction with the intention of proceeding against the surety who had properties within the jurisdiction of the Munsif of Sealdah. The surety filed an objection that the debtor filed a petition in insolvency, and that the decree-holder did not proceed against him. The learned Munsif overruled the objection on the ground that what the decree-holder wanted was to proceed against the surety and not against the judgment-debtor. The application for execution at Sealdah, however, was dismissed by the Munsif on the ground that it was premature and that the decree-holder must proceed against the judgment-debtor in the first instance. There was then an appeal against that decision to the District Judge at Alipore and the learned Second Additional District Judge reversed the decision of the Munsif holding that the decree-holder was entitled to proceed against the surety or against the properties of the surety in the hands of his heirs.

The present appeal is directed against this decision of the learned Additional District Judge and two main points have been urged on his behalf. Firstly, it has been contended that the Court below should have held that the surety was in law discharged from the bond by reason of the judgment-debtor and decree-holder consenting to the case being determined not by the ordinary tribunal, that is to say, by the Court, but by a special tribunal namely by an arbitrator and secondly, it has been urged that having regard to the terms of the surety bond the Court below ought to have held that the decree-holder not having taken any steps to realize the decretal amount from the judgment-debtor could not execute the decree against the surety.

With regard to the first contention: the material portion of the security bond has been placed before us and it appears that what the surety undertook therein was that in the event of a decree being passed in the suit, if the money could not be realized from the judgment-debtor, then he, the surety, would be liable for the amount. Now the question is what exactly was the liability which the surety undertook. It is arguable no doubt that when he speaks of a decree he means a decree arrived at by any of the various means by which a decree may be arrived at, and that it would cover the case of a decree arrived at after compromise. The terms of such surety bonds should, however, as is well-recognized, be interpreted in a manner favourable to the surety or guarantor as the case may be, and looking to the terms of this particular security bond, in my judgment, what the surety agreed was that in the event of there being a decree in the suit, that is to say, after contest between the parties before the Court, he would be liable for the decretal amount. I do not think, however that it was in contemplation that the surety would hold himself liable for the decretal money in any other circumstances. In my opinion, therefore, the first contention of the appellant is well founded and must prevail.

With regard to the second point I think on a consideration of the terms of the security bond that it was incumbent upon the decree-holder to proceed in the first instance against the judgment-debtor, and it was only if it was established that the decretal amount could not be realized from the judgment-debtor that it was open to him to proceed against the surety. It appears, however, that there was nothing before the Munsif to show that any proper attempt had been made to realize the decretal amount from the judgment-debtor. I think, therefore, that the Munsif was right in the view he took of the application.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal succeeds and must be allowed with costs.

Page, J.—To my mind this is a very plain case. Having regard to the terms of the bond the surety agreed, if the creditor was unable to obtain payment of the decretal amount from the debtor, to liquidate any sum which the Court after contest should hold was payable by the debtor to the creditor. Some tribunal had to decide the issue as to the liability of the debtor.

The parties chose to have this done by some one in the confidence of both parties

But to such an arrangement the surety was no party and he never undertook that the liability of the debtor should be determined by any body whom the debtor and creditor might choose to agree upon as the tribunal; and unless he assented to it such an arrangement as was made operated as a discharge of the surety. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Civil Revn. No. 35 of 1927, Decided on 26th January 1927, from order of Second Munsif, Tamluk, D/- 13th November 1926

(a) Civil P. C., O. 21, R. 103—Suit under the rule should be subsequent to investigation under R. 100.

A suit contemplated under R. 103, O. 21, is one which may be instituted after a due and proper investigation of the matter in accordance with R. 100. Where the matter has not been so investigated, but has been disposed of on default on the part of one or other of the parties the remedy by way of suit is hardly a remedy for the dismissal by default, but is merely a further step which the law provides for all unsuccessful parties in such cases.

(b) Civil P. C., S. 151—Application under R. 100, O. 21—Claim allowed in the absence of decree-holder—Whole case not placed before the Court—Suit should be restored under S. 151.

Where there is no provision in the Code expressly providing for a remedy and none which prohibits a remedy being administered and such remedy is called for in order to do that real and substantial justice for the administration of which it exists, the provision of S. 151 may and should be resorted to.

A person applied under O. 21, R. 100, in connexion with an execution case and the decree-holder not having appeared, the latter's claim prayed for in the application was allowed. Decree-holder filed an application under O. 9, R. 13, for setting aside the aforesaid ex-parte order and for the rehearing of the claim case, O. 9, not being applicable to application arising out of execution proceedings, the trial Court thinking that in, obtaining the ex-parte order the claimants had not put the whole case before the Court, ordered the claim case to be restored under S. 151 to file.

Held : that the trial Court was right in exercising its powers under S. 151 in restoring the claim case : A. I. R. 1927 Cal. 534, Foll.

Apurba Charan Mukherji—for Petitioner.

Mukerji, J.—This Rule is directed against an order passed by the Munsif, Second Court, Tamluk, on the 13th November 1926. The petitioners had applied under O. 21, R. 100, Civil P. C., in connexion with an execution case that was pending in the Court of the learned Munsif. The application was registered as a claim case and was taken up for hearing on the 2nd July 1926, when the decree-holder, not having appeared the petitioners' claim was allowed. On the 22nd July 1926 the decree-holder filed an application under O. 9, R. 13, Civil P. C., for setting aside the aforesaid ex-parte order and for the re-hearing of the claim case. The learned Munsif dealt with this matter on the 13th November 1926. He came to be of opinion that there was some mistake somewhere in consequence of which the decree-holder was unable to appear on the day on which the claim case was heard. He held, however, that O. 9, Civil P. C., was not applicable to applications arising out of execution proceedings, and in that view of the matter he was unable to give relief to the decree-holder under the provisions of that order. He thought that in obtaining the ex-parte order the claimants had not put the whole case before the Court and accordingly this was a matter which called for the exercise of the Court's powers under S. 151, Civil P. C. In this view of the matter he ordered the claim case to be restored to file. It is this order against which the present rule is directed.

Now, in the judgment of this Court in Sarat Krishna Bose v. Mitra (1), to which I was a party, it was held on a discussion of the authorities bearing upon the subject that O. 9, Civil P. C., is not applicable to applications arising out of execution proceedings and it was further observed that in cases where there is no remedy provided for by the Code when such an application is dismissed for default and there is nothing in the Code to suggest that no remedy should be given, the Court may very well in a proper case resort to the provisions of S. 151, Civil P. C. On behalf of the petitioners it is contended that a remedy in this particular case is provided for by the Code itself, inasmuch as an aggrieved party may institute a suit to establish the right which he claims in the claim case in accordance with the provisions of R 103, O 21, Civil P. C. That no doubt is so; but a suit contemplated under that rule is one which may be instituted after a due and proper investigation of the matter in accordance with R. 100, O. 21 of the Code, where the matter has not been so investigated but has been disposed of on default on the part of one or other of the parties the remedy by way of suit is hardly a remedy for the dismissal by default, but is merely a further step which the law provides for all unsuccessful parties in such cases. I am accordingly of opinion that it cannot be said that the provision with regard to the suit to which reference has been made on behalf of the petitioners in any way stands in the way of the applicability of the provisions of S 151 of the Code. In the case to which I have referred it has been laid down that where there is no provision in the Code expressly providing for a remedy and none which prohibits a remedy being administered and such remedy is called for in order to do that real and substantial justice for the administration of which it exists, the provision of S. 151 may and should be resorted to. In this particular case the learned Munsif was of opinion that all the facts had not been properly brought to his notice and being of that opinion he thought fit to exercise his powers under S. 151 of the Code. The only defect in the procedure which the learned Munsif adopted appears to have been this that it did not give the petitioners an opportunity of being heard in connexion with these proceedings. Ordinarily, that would have been a good ground for our interference. But in view of the fact that he is the same officer who thought that the facts were not properly placed before him and also in view of the fact that after all the whole matter will now be heard on its merits in the presence of both the parties, I do not think the case calls for the interference of this Court.

For these reasons, I would discharge the rule. The opposite parties not having appeared there will be no order as to costs

Appeal No. 315 of 1925, Decided on 3rd August 1927, from appellate decree of Dist. Judge, Rajshahi, D/- 12th September 1924.

(a) Appeal — Competency — Suit for mesne profits against co-trespassers—Decree passed against all—Decree in its entirety only can be challenged in appeal.

In an action for mesne profits against the trespassers, while it is open to the plaintiff to proceed against one or some or all of several co-trespassers at his own choice, once a decree has been obtained, it is the decree in its entirety that may be challenged on appeal and not otherwise; for so long as the decree against some remains a final and operative decree and not subject to an appeal, even though it is not satisfied but is capable of execution, the plaintiff cannot proceed with the suit further and take an appeal as against the others: (Case law discussed). [P 182 C 1]

(b) Tort — Joint tort-feasors — Rule as to joint liability is not inflexible.

As a general rule the liability of joint wrongdoers in tort is joint and several, but it is not an inflexible rule which needs no relaxation according to the view that is taken of jointness of the act or acts which constitute the wrong: (Case law discussed). [P 182 C 1]

Judgment—This appeal arises out of a final decree determining mesne profits. The proceedings followed a decree for possession with mesne profits in favour of the plaintiff and against a very large number of defendants who belong to two classes, viz., the landlord-defendants and the tenant-defendants. The plaintiff has appealed, but some of the defendants of the latter class are not before us, one of them not having been made a party to the appeal and three others having died and an application to substitute their heirs in their places not having been allowed as it was filed out of time. The decisions of the Courts below assessing the amount of mesne profits are concurrent.

A preliminary objection has been taken as to the maintainability of the appeal in view of the defect of parties noticed above. This objection will have to be dealt with first.

The claim for mesne profits is one to recover damages for the previous occupation of the land and under the present procedure it can be joined with the action for the recovery of the land. In the present case it was so joined and a decree entitling the plaintiff to mesne profits was passed against all the defendants in the suit. In the proceedings relating to the ascertainment of mesne profits, a certain sum was assessed by the trial Court and the decree passed on the basis of the said assessment has been upheld by the lower appellate Court. The object of the plaintiff in preferring this appeal is to vary the amount so assessed. His ground is that the assessment has been made on a wrong principle.

An action for mesne profits is in origin an action of trespass. It is, therefore, regulated by these broad principles which apply to and are now well settled as being applicable to actions for damages against wrongdoers. In such actions joint wrongdoers may be sued jointly or severally.

In Pollock on the Law of Torts, 10th edn p. 206 the principles are stated thus :

Where more than one person is concerned in the commission of a wrong, the person wronged has his remedy against all or any one or more of them at his choice. Every wrongdoer is liable for the whole damage, and it does not matter, whether they acted, as between themselves, as equals, or one of them as agent or servant of another. There are no degrees of responsibility, nothing answering to the distinction in criminal law between principals and accessories. But when the plaintiff in such a case has made his choice, he is concluded by it. After recovering judgment against some or one of the joint authors of a wrong, he cannot sue the other or others for the same matter, even if the judgment in the first action remains unsatisfied. By that judgment the cause of action transit in rem judicatum and is no longer available. The reason of the rule is stated to be that otherwise a vexatious multiplicity of actions would be encouraged.

As regards joint torts it is said in Addison's Law of Torts, 8th edn. p. 44 :

All who aid or counsel, direct or join in the commission of a tort are joint tort-feasors. 'If divers do a trespass it is joint and several at the will of him to whom the wrong is done', that is to say, he can sue any one or more of them at his election, and those who are sued cannot insist on having the others joined as defendants.

In Thurman v. Waild (1) and other cases it was settled that an accord and satisfaction by one wrongdoer for the whole injury done discharges all the wrongdoers. A release, therefore, given of the whole cause of action to one discharges the others, the reason being that the cause of action being one and indivisible having been released, all persons otherwise liable thereto are consequently released : Cocke v. Jennor (2). But a covenant or agreement not to sue one of them is no defence to an action against the others : Hutton v. Eyre (3). If therefore while purporting to release one tortfeasor it reserves rights against another, it will be construed as a covenant not to sue and not a release : Duck v. Mayeu (4), Rice v. Reed (5). The rule for construing such a document was laid down in the case of Price v. Barker (6) and is to the effect that the meaning would turn upon the intention to be gathered as to whether the right against a joint debtor was intended to be preserved or not. In King v. Hoare (7) Parke, B, authoritatively laid down :

These considerations lead us, quite satisfactorily to our minds, to the conclusion that where judgment has been obtained for a debt, as well as a tort, the right given by the record merges the inferior remedy for the same debt or tort against another party.

See also Buckland v. Johnson (8), Brinsmead v. Harrison (9), Kendall v. Hamilton (10). Brinsmead v. Harrison (9) settled the point that after recovering judgment against one wrongdoer, a plaintiff cannot sue the other for the same matter, even if the first action remains unsatisfied a proposition which was doubted before them. Though S 43, Contract Act, is not perhaps quite clear whether a complete adaptation of the English rule is intended, yet King v. Hoare (7) has been held to apply in this country both in respect of joint debtors and of joint wrongdoers.

If these principles are applied to an action for mesne profits against co-trespassers the position is clear that while it is open to the plaintiff to proceed against one or some or all of several co-trespassers at his own choice, once a decree has been obtained it is the decree in its entirety that may be challenged on appeal and not otherwise; for so long as the decree against some remains a final and operative decree and not subject to an appeal, even though it is not satisfied but is capable of execution, the plaintiff cannot proceed with the suit further and take an appeal as against the others.

The question of the maintainability or otherwise of the appeal may be considered from another point of view, namely, as being dependent upon the question whether there is a right of contribution amongst the defendants inter se because if there is such a right, the decree, on the appeal if it varies that from which the appeal has been preferred will affect the rights and liabilities of those parties who are not before the Court and will produce an inconsistency on the record which is not permitted by law.

No doubt, as a general rule the liability of joint wrongdoers in tort is joint and several, but it is not an inflexible rule which needs no relaxation according to the view that is taken of jointness of the act or acts which constitute the wrong. Mookerjee, J., in an elaborate judgment in the case of Ram Ratan Kapali v. Aswini Kumar Dutt (11), in which he has exhaustively dealt with the question, has observed thus:

It cannot be laid down as an inflexible rule that in every case of tort, the Court is bound to pass a joint decree against the wrongdoers making each jointly and severally liable for the whole amount decreed. . . . In cases, therefore, in which the controlling general principle, namely, that where acts of several persons by design, or by conduct tantamount to conspiracy, contribute to the commission of a wrong, they are jointly liable, is not applicable, the rule of joint liability also ceases to be applicable.

In that case it was held that in respect of mesne profits which accrue during the pendency of a suit for possession, the liability of different tenure-holders of the same degree, and of separate under-tenure holders of different degrees, should be apportioned according to the share of the profits intercepted by each. This decision has been dissented from by Page, J., in the case of Promode Nath Roy v. Secy. of State (12). With great respect, however, I venture to think that the judgment of Mookerjee, J., carefully read, appears to except from the general rule cases in which the tort-feasors are not really joint and are, therefore, persons to whom the rule does not apply and, in my opinion, therefore, the judgment is unexceptionable. Merryweather v. Nixon (13) was a case in which one S brought an action against two persons for an injury done by them to his reversionary estate in a mill, in which was included a count in trover for the machinery belonging to the mill and having recovered £840, he levied the whole upon one of the said two persons, and one of them then sued the other for a contribution of the moiety, as for so much money paid to his use. The plaintiff was nonsuited. Lord Kenyon, C. J., said that he had never before heard of such an action having been brought, where the former recovery was for a tort, that the distinction was clear between this case and that of a joint judgment against several defendants in an action of assumpsit; and that this decision would not affect cases of indemnity where one man employed another to do acts, not unlawful in themselves, for the purpose of asserting a right.

The rule has been modified in collision cases: The Frankland (14), Austin Friars Steamship Co. v. Spiller & Bakers Ltd (15). Relying upon Palmer v Wick Steam Shipping Co. (16) it has been said in more decisions than one that the rule will not be extended. The rule has been said by very high authority as having been too widely laid down and it has been said that it is to be taken with the qualification that it will hold if the nature of the case is such that the plaintiff must be presumed to have known that he was doing an unlawful act: See Pollock on the Law of Torts, 10th edn.,

In this country the doctrine has not been applied in cases of contribution regarding mesne profits where the parties were not wilful tortfeasors, Bishnu Charan Roy v. Bipin Chandra Roy (20), and doubt has been entertained whether it applies to this country at all [Nihal Singh v. Collector of Bulandshahr (21)] When wrongdoers have acted under a bona fide claim of right and had reason to suppose that they had a right to do what they did, contribution inter se may be allowed: Sreeputtty Roy v. Laharam Roy (22); Suput Singh v. Imrit Tewari (23); Kishnu Ram v. Rakmini Sewak Singh (24); Mahabir Prasad v. Darbhangi Thakur (25). There has been cases in which the liability of cotrespassers for mesne profits has been apportioned where their shares are capable of being determined, e g, Makund Singh v. Saraswati Bibi (26).

On behalf of the appellant it was contended that in the present case it has already been found that all the defendants acted in concert and consequently Merryweather v. Nixon (13) should be applied in all its integrity and no question of contribution can possibly arise. In support of this contention reliance has been placed upon certain findings in the judgments declaring the plaintiff's right to khas possession and mesne profits. I have carefully examined these findings, but I am unable to hold that they were ever intended to be treated as findings decisive of the question. The question never arose for determination in the suit as it is obviously a question between the defendants inter se and there was no issue raised for its effective determination.

The result then is that the appeal is no longer maintainable. In that view the appellant's contention as to the propriety of the principle on which mesne profits have been calculated need not be considered.

The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—In this case we are of opinion that the rule must be made absolute. We have examined the record for ourselves, and we are satisfied that Mr. Mukherjee, who had second class powers and to whom the case was transferred, had no jurisdiction to try the case against the accused under S. 471. The evidence recorded by him could not be legally considered by the Magistrate to whom the case was ultimately transferred and who had jurisdiction in the matter. The result was that part of the evidence was recorded by a Magistrate who had no jurisdiction, and part of the evidence by a Magistrate who had jurisdiction. In this view the petitioner has made good the ground on which the rule was issued, and we, accordingly, set aside the order. But in the circumstances of the case we order a re-trial of the accused in accordance with law in that behalf.

Appeal No. 561 of 1925, Decided on 10th May 1927, from appellate decree of Spl. Judge, Jessore, D/- 1st Dec. 1924.

(a) Civil P. C., O. 22, R. 3—Death of party—Legal representative not brought on record—Abatement operates as a decree.

A dead person is no longer a party to a suit in any capacity. [P 184 C 2]

An order of abatement by virtue of the death of the party is virtually a decree as it disposes of the plaintiff's claim as completely as if the suit has been dismissed. [P 185 C 1]

Mallik, J.—The order of abatement operates as a judgment as between him and the respondents to the same extent as a judgment on merits : 10 Bom. 220 ; 18 Mad. 496 and 38 M. L. J. 266, Foll. [P 185 C 2, P 196 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C., O. 41, R. 4—Appeal by joint defendants against decree passed against them—Death of one defendant before hearing appeal—His legal representative not brought on record—Whole appeal is incompetent.

So long as the orders of abatement remain it must be considered to have determined the rights between the parties : 10 Bom. 220 and 18 Mad. 496, Foll. [P 185 C 1]

To allow an appellant whose appeal has abated to gain the advantage of O. 41, R. 4 will result in the anomaly that so far as that appellant is concerned, there will be two decrees in the same suit in existence at the same time, one in his favour and one against him. [P 185 C 1]

Tenants of a certain holding brought a suit against landlord who were four in number under S. 106, Ben. Ten. Act, on the allegation that the rent was really Rs. 7 instead of Rs. 10 as entered in the record and got the decree. The landlord-defendants appealed, but before the hearing of the appeal one of the appellants died and his heirs were not brought on the record and consequently the appeal, so far as he was concerned, abated.

Held : that the appeal as it stood was incompetent for one of the necessary parties in whose absence the appeal could not proceed was not on the record. [P 191 C 2, P 185 C 1]

Mallik, J.—For the determination of the question whether the appeal is competent after partial abatement, the true test seems to be whether the appeal can be heard in the absence of the appellant who is dead. Whether the appeal can be heard in the absence of one of the appellants will depend on the nature of the suit and the decree made : 9 C. W. N. 1031, Foll. [P 186 C 1]

Nakuleswar Mukherjee—for Appellants.
Prafulla Kamal Das—for Respondents.

Cuming, J.—The facts of the case out of which this appeal arises are these :

In khatian No. 128 the rent of the holding was entered as Rs. 10. The plaintiffs who are the tenants of the holding brought a suit under S. 106, Ben. Ten. Act, on the allegation that the rent was really Rs. 7, and praying that the record might be corrected accordingly.

The Assistant Settlement Officer held that the rent was Rs. 10 as entered in the Record-of-Rights and dismissed the plaintiffs' suit.

The plaintiffs appealed to the Special Judge. The Special Judge was of opinion that the rent was Rs. 7 and decreed the appeal.

The landlord-defendants, who are four in number, appealed to this Court

Before the hearing of the appeal one of the appellants, defendant 4, died. His heirs have not been brought on the record and consequently the appeal, so far as he is concerned, has abated

The respondent now contends that as the appeal has abated with regard to one of the appellants the whole appeal must fail because the right to appeal does not survive to the other three appellants alone. If they are allowed to appeal and are successful, the result will be that so far as some of the landlords are concerned, the rate of rent will be Rs. 7 and as regard others Rs. 10. The contention no doubt is correct: see Kali Dayal v. Nagendra Nath (1). The appellants, however, argue that the three appellants, who are still on the record can appeal and as regards the appellant in whose case the appeal has abated the Court can apply the principle of O. 41, R. 4.

His counsel contends that the three appellants on the record have appealed from the whole decree on grounds which are common also to appellant 4 and that therefore the Court can reverse or vary the decree in his favour also (O. 41 R. 4).

The first difficulty I have in accepting this contention is that I cannot imagine that the Court can vary or reverse a decree in favour of a person who is dead and no longer has any existence. So far as defendant 4 is concerned, he is no longer a defendant, for he is dead. Possibly he has some heirs, but they are not on the record and so are obviously not parties. O. 41, R. 4 can have no application therefore. A dead person is no longer a party to a suit in any capacity

No doubt the death of an appellant does not cause the appeal to abate if the right to appeal survives, but this does not mean that any decree can be passed in favour of the dead person. It merely provides that his heir or representatives may carry on the litigation, and if they so desire, have themselves duly been made party. There is a further consideration which I think also makes it clear that O. 41, R. 4 can have no application. The appeal having abated so far as appellant 4 is concerned the rights between him and the respondents have been determined.

As pointed out by Sargent, C. J., in the case of Bhikaji v. Purshotam (2) an order of abatement is virtually a decree as it disposes of the plaintiff's (in this case the appellants') claim as completely as if the suit has been dismissed. This view was followed by the Madras High Court: Subbayya v. Saminadayyar (3). So long as the orders of abatement remain, must be considered to have determined the rights between the parties. To allow an appellant whose appeal has abated to gain the advantage of O. 41, R. 4 would result in the anomaly that, so far as that appellant was concerned, there would be two decrees in the same suit in existence at the same time: one in his favour and one against him. The conclusion to which I have no difficulty in coming is that O. 41, R. 4 cannot be applied to the case of an appellant whose appeal has abated by his death.

No doubt there are decisions to the contrary: Chintaman Nilkant v. Gangadai (4); Somasundaram v. Vaithilinga (5). The view however which I have taken seems to have found favour with this Court: Protap Chandra v. Durga Charan (6). Clearly the appeal as it now stands is incompetent, for one of the necessary parties in whose absence the appeal could not proceed is not on the record. The appeal must therefore be dismissed as being incompetent. The respondent is entitled to his costs. Hearing-fee: one gold mohur.

Mallik, J.—The suit out of which his appeal arises was one under S. 106, Ben. Ten. Act. The tenants were the plaintiffs in that suit. Their prayer was for a correction of a certain entry in respect of khatian No. 128 on the allegation that the rent of the holding was Rs. 7 and not Rs. 10 as entered in the Record-of-Rights. The Assistant Settlement Officer who tried the suit held that the rent of the holding was Rs. 10, and on that finding he dismissed the suit. On appeal the learned Special Judge found that the rent of the holding was not Rs. 10 but Rs. 7, and accordingly he directed a correction of the entry as prayed for. The defendant-landlords have appealed to this Court.

On behalf of the respondents a preliminary objection has been taken that the appeal is incompetent. It appears that one of the appellants, defendant 4, died after the institution of the appeal to this Court, and it appears also that his legal representatives have not been brought on the record. It was said that under O. 22, R. 3, Civil P. C., the result of this is that the appeal has abated so far as defendant 4 is concerned, and after that abatement the appeal does not stand properly constituted. To meet this contention a number of cases decided by Courts other than this Court were cited before us. Among them are the cases of Chandar Sang v. Khimabhai (7); Chintaman Nilkant v. Gangadai (4), Ram Sewak v. Lambar Pande (8) and Somasundaram v. Vaithilinga (5). These cases were decided on the principle laid down in O. 41, R. 4, Civil P. C. O. 41, R. 4 runs thus:

Where there are more plaintiffs or more defendants than one in a suit and the decree appealed from proceeds on any ground common to all the plaintiffs or to all the defendants, any one of the plaintiffs or of the defendants may appeal from the whole decree and thereupon the appellate Court may reverse or vary the decree in favour of all the plaintiffs or defendants as the case may be.

It was said that although defendant 4 had died and his legal representatives had not been brought on the record, the Court might proceed to hear the appeal under O. 41, R. 4. I do not think that this contention is sound. In cases falling under O. 41, R. 4 the Court may reverse or vary the decree in favour of all the plaintiffs or defendants. But in the present case that is not possible. The appeal has abated so far as defendant 4 is concerned. This order of abatement operates as a judgment as between him and the respondents to the same extent as a judgment on merits: Rahimunnissa Begam v. Srinivasa Aiyangar (9). For the determination of the question, whether the appeal is competent after partial abatement, the true test seems to be whether the appeal can be heard in the absence of the appellant who is dead. Now whether the appeal can be heard in the absence of one of the appellants will depend on the nature of the suit and the decree made. In the present case the suit was for correction of a certain entry in the Record-of-Rights and the decree made was the correction of that entry from Rs. 10 to Rs. 7. The appeal, if heard, will have to be either allowed or dismissed. There would be no difficulty in the case of dismissal. But considerable difficulty will arise in case the appeal is allowed. The figure Rs. 7 will have to be altered in the case of the present appellants, but it will have to be kept intact so far as the heirs of defendant 4 are concerned. This, I need hardly say, would be an impossible position. I am therefore of opinion that, in the circumstances of the case the appeal cannot be heard in the absence of the legal representatives of defendant 4. The result of the partial abatement is that the appeal is imperfectly constituted, and in the absence of necessary parties I do not think that we can proceed to decide the appeal on merits. In this view of the matter I am supported by the decision in the case of Kali Dayal v. Nagendra Nath (1). The preliminary objection must therefore be sustained and the appeal dismissed with costs.

C., decides nothing, and the reasons that the Court gives for its support are given merely for its own convenience for the purpose of the determination of the appeal under O. 41, R. 26, Civil P. C., and for helping the lower Court to proceed rightly in carrying out the order. The Court, either the same or differently constituted, when determining the appeal finally has ample jurisdiction to go back on the views as expressed in the order of remand passed under O. 41, R. 25, Civil P. C., and indeed it would fail in its duty if in deference to those views which are entitled to the highest respect, it persists in them, although it is satisfied that they are erroneous. [P 188 C 1]

The finding or decision of a Division Bench of a High Court in remanding a case is not conclusive as between the parties to the appeal and it can be reopened at the final determination of appeal: A. I. R. 1923 Cal 521, Foll. [P 187 C 2]

(b) Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 7—Etmam tenure in Chittagong, not being from the time of permanent settlement—Rent can be enhanced.

The etmam tenure in Chittagong which has not been proved to have existed from the time of the permanent settlement is excluded from the operation of S. 6, Ben. Ten. Act, and the rent is enhancible under S. 7. [P 188 C 2]

Mukerji, J—The facts relating to the litigation which has given rise to this appeal and the circumstances under which the appeal has come up for hearing before us are as follows:

The plaintiff instituted the suit for ejecting the defendants from a tenure after service of a notice to quit, and in the alternative for enhancement of the rent of the tenure either at the customary rate or up to such limit as the Court thinks fair and equitable. The defence was that the tenure was an etmam, and that it was held as a permanent tenancy at a fixed rate of rent, and that therefore the plaintiffs' claim should be dismissed.

The plaintiffs' case was that the tenure was a temporary one bearing a rental of Rs. 12 and was created by a kabuliyat in 1212 M. E. (=1851). The trial Court held that the question whether the kabuliyat was genuine or not was barred by res judicata, and though it was inclined to hold that it was genuine, it felt constrained to hold otherwise because it had been so found in a previous suit. It held that the tenancy was an etmam which in the part of the district of Chittagaong, to which the suit relates, means a permanent heritable and transferable tenure. The plaintiffs' claim for khas possession was accordingly dismissed by that Court and there it ended.

On the question of enhancement of rent, the defendants relied upon the presumption contained in S. 50, Ben Ten. Act, and also the further presumption based on the dictum of the Judicial Committee in the case of Port Canning Improvement Co. v. Katyan Das (1) which is to the effect that where a tenure is proved to be permanent, heritable and transferable, the presumption of fixity of rent must arise in favour of the tenant.

The trial Court gave effect to the latter presumption and dismissed the plaintiffs' claim for enhancement. The District Judge, on appeal by the plaintiffs, appears to have ignored this presumption and was unable to give the defendants the benefit of the presumption under S 50 as it was not known whether the rent of the tenure created in 1851 by the amalgamation of the two tenures that existed before was any different from the sum total of the rents of the latter. Being of that opinion the District Judge held that the rent of the tenure was liable to enhancement. In that view he set aside the decree of the trial Court and remanded the suit for a fresh decision on framing the relevant issues that would arise in a suit for enhancement of rent under S 7, Ben. Ten. Act. He suggested the following issues:

Is there any customary rent payable by persons holding similar tenures in the vicinity?

If so, what is the customary rent?

If not, what is the fair and equitable rent?

What are the gross rents of the tenure-holder?

The defendants then preferred the present appeal. It came on for hearing before a Division Bench of this Court. On the 14th June 1926 that Bench made an order under O. 41, R. 25, Civil P. C. The substance of the order then made was that the Munsif would, on giving the parties opportunity to adduce such further evidence as they might desire, record his findings on the following questions and then resubmit the records to this Court: 1st.: Whether Rs 12, the rent of the tenure, represented the sum total of the rent of the holdings amalgamated in 1851, and whether the presumption under S. 50, Ben Ten. Act, arose in favour of the defendants; 2nd whether the presumption of fixity of rent which arises from the fact that the etmam is a permanent, heritable and transferable tenure has been rebutted; and 3rd what is the customary rate or what is a fair and equitable rent for the tenure? It was indicated in the order that the onus of proving that the presumption mentioned in the second question was on the plaintiff, and that the third question need not be gone into if the Munsif found that the rent is not enhanceable.

The Munsif in an elaborate judgment has held that the presumption under S 50 does not arise, but that the other presumption, namely, as to fixity of rent which arises from the fact of the tenure being permanent, heritable and transferable has not been rebutted. On these findings, there was no necessity for him, under the terms of the remand order, to go into the third question and he has not done so. The appeal has then come up before us for final determination.

On these findings of the learned Munsif the appellants contend that there should be an end of the plaintiffs' suit. The respondent, on the other hand, contends that there is no presumption, either in fact or in law, that because a tenure is permanent, heritable and transferable, its rent is fixed; or, in other words, that the remand order made by this Court was misconceived and the enquiry into question of fixity of rent as based on this presumption has been useless. To this contention the appellants rejoined that inasmuch as a Division Bench has already held, rightly or wrongly, that there is such a presumption, that finding or decision is conclusive as between the parties to the appeal and it cannot be reopened. This position however cannot be seriously maintained in view of a long course of decisions of this Court: Ganendra Nath v. Surya Kanta (2); Hiatunnessa Bibi v. Kailash Chandra (3); Hanuman Das v. Gur Sahai (4);

Official Assignee of Calcutta v. Bidya Sundari (5) and Kamini Kumar v. Durga Charan (6). An order of remand made under O. 41, R. 25, Civil P. C., decides nothing, and the reasons that the Court gives for its support are given merely for its own convenience for the purpose of the determination of the appeal under O. 41, R. 26, Civil P. C., and for helping the lower Court to proceed rightly in carrying out the order. The Court, either the same or differently constituted, when determining the appeal finally, has ample jurisdiction to go back on the views as expressed in the order of remand passed under O. 41, R. 25, Civil P. C., and indeed it would fail in its duty if, in deference to those views which, no doubt, are entitled to the highest respect, it persists in them, although it is satisfied that they are erroneous. It is necessary therefore to consider the respondents' contention on its merits.

The presumption, it must be noted, has no foundation in any statute law and indeed seems to be in conflict with general principles, such as are recognized in numerous authoritative decisions. It rests entirely upon a dictum of the Judicial Committee in Port Canning Land Improvement Corporation v. Katyayani Debi (1) which runs in these words:

Ordinarily the two admitted characteristics (meaning, heritability and transferability which were the two admitted characteristics in that case) would create a presumption in favour of the tenant and throw on the plaintiff the onus of showing that the tenure is wanting in the characteristic of fixity of rent.

The decision of their Lordships in that case, however, did not rest on this presumption and on the other hand proceeded in spite of it and throwing the onus on the defendants, the tenants, as is clear from the passages which follow. Though thus obiter, the dictum was treated as laying down a principle well worth acceptance and the order of remand made by this Court was based on it. A later pronouncement of the Judicial Committee in the case of Krishnendra Nath Sarkar v. Kusum Kamini Debi (7) however seems clearly to militate against the correctness of the dictum. No such presumption was relied on in that case, though it should have been if the dictum was correct, and on the other hand the effect of that decision is to hold that unless there is something to indicate that the landlord abandoned his right to enhancement, such right must be taken to exist even in the case of a permanent, heritable and transferable tenure. In the case of Bhupendra Chandra v. Harihar Chakravarti (8), it has been pointed out that the dictum was meant to apply to the special circumstances of the case, namely, that the land was let out for purposes of reclamation, that for some years from the commencement of the tenancy no rent was payable, that there was a progressive scale of rent for several periods prescribed thereafter and that there was no provision for any different rent for any period thereafter. It has been pointed out that in view of these special circumstances the last of the series of rents so prescribed was held as being intended to have been fixed in perpetuity. However that may be, the dictum in its broad form in which it is laid down can no longer be treated as authoritative. The appellants seek to justify the correctness of the dictum by reference to the decision of the Privy Council in Bamasoondery Dassiah v. Radhika Chowdhraïn (9). That decision relates to the rights of a zemindar holding under a perpetual settlement to enhance the rent of his rent-paying lands, and deals with taluks within the meaning of the S. 51 and ryoti and other under-tenures provided for in S. 49, Bengal Regulation 8 of 1793. The decision has very little bearing on the present case.

The plaintiff in the present case is the holder of a Noabad taluk in respect of which the Government stands in the same position as an ordinary zemindar: Nazir Ahmmad v. Secretary of State (10). The etimam has not been proved to have existed from the time of the Permanent Settlement so as to attract the operation of S. 6, Ben. Ten. Act. The dictum being out of the way, the rent must be held to be enhancible and the issues necessarily to be decided in order to deal with the question of enhancement will accordingly have to be gone into.

There was one contention advanced on behalf of the appellants at the time when the appeal was heard by the former Division Bench. It relates to the form of the remand which was made by the learned District Judge. This contention was reserved for consideration till now. The respondent concedes that it is not necessary to send the whole case down to the trial Court, but that it will be sufficient if the necessary issues are framed and sent to the trial Court for decision—the procedure that is contemplated by O. 41, R. 23, Civil P. C. This contention must be upheld.

We accordingly allow the appeal to this extent that we affirm the decision of the learned District Judge that the rent of the tenure is enhancable and while setting aside the order of remand passed by him in the form in which it has been made, direct that he do lay down the necessary issues, including the three issues already framed by him, and send them to the trial Court for its findings, and on receipt of the findings from that Court, finally dispose of the appeal.

We think that in the events that have happened, all the costs in this appeal will be borne by the parties for themselves.

S. C. Talukdar—for Petitioner.

Kanaidhan Dutt—for Opposite Party.

Mukerji, J.—This rule arises out of an application under O 21, R. 90, Civil P. C. which was filed on behalf of the judgment-debtors on the 4th April 1925 in connexion with a sale that had taken place on the 11th January 1922. In the application as originally filed the auction-purchaser was not made a party. He applied on 5th September 1925 to be made a party to the proceedings and on that day an order was made to the effect that he should be made a party. The application was dealt with on its merits by the learned Munsif of Narainganj who on 30th October 1925 set aside the sale and directed the decree-holder to take steps for re-sale of the property. From this order appeals were preferred by the judgment-debtors as well as by the auction purchaser and the result of these appeals was that the learned Additional District Judge of Dacca affirmed the order which the learned Munsif had passed. The auction-purchaser had now moved this Court and obtained the present rule.

The question which arises in this rule is whether the application under O. 21, R. 90, Civil P. C., was competent inasmuch as the auction-purchaser was not made a party therein till long after the prescribed period of limitation for such an application had expired. The question raised is one not free of difficulty. The learned Munsif was of opinion that there was no analogy between the addition of a party in a suit and that in an application under O. 21, R. 90, Civil P. C. and that it would not have mattered in the least if the name of the auction-purchaser was not mentioned in the application. In his opinion all that is required by the law is that before the sale can be set aside or confirmed the notice of the application has to be served upon the auction-purchaser and that such notice should be given by the Court whether the applicant does or does not pray therefor. Upon a consideration of the relevant provisions of the Code I am inclined to agree with the learned Munsif in the view that he has taken. There are, however, conflicting decisions on this point in the different Courts. In the Patna High Court Mr. Justice Ross, sitting singly held in the case of Sumitra v. Damri Hall (1) that the auction-purchaser is a necessary party to an application to set aside an execution sale, and where he is not made a party within the time allowed by the law for making the application, the application cannot be entertained. The Patna High Court, however, in a very recent case has taken a contrary view. A Division Bench of that Court, in the case of Iswardas v. Biseswar Lal (2) overruled the contention that was put forward on behalf of the auction-purchaser to the effect that it is necessary to have the parties affected by the application as parties to the application and held that the whole object of R. 92, O. 21 is to provide that no adverse order be passed in the absence of the persons affected by the order and that in one sense all the decree-holders and the auction purchaser are to be treated as being parties to the proceeding inasmuch as their names are already on the record. The learned Judges purported to follow another decision of the same Court in the case of Bibi Zainab v. Paresh Nath (3).

The Bombay High Court has held definitely in the case of Ganesh Bab v. Vithal Vaman (4) that in a case under O. 21, R. 89, Civil P. C. to which the same considerations would apply, although the auction-purchaser was a necessary party for the determination of the question which would arise under O. 21, R. 92 Civil P. C. an application in which he was not made a party but which was filed within thirty days was not bad on the ground that he was not made a party therein. The same view appears to have been taken in Oudh Abdur Rahman v. Har Narayan Das (5). There is a decision of the Allahabad High Court under the Code of 1882 in which a contrary view was taken. That is the case of Aligauhar Khan v. Bansidhar (6). It may be pointed out that this decision was by Mr. Justice Burkitt sitting alone. So far as this Court is concerned there is no case on the point reported in any of the authorized reports. There are, however, two unreported decisions one in the case of Ajeuddin Ahamed v. Khoda Buc (7) and also a decision in Civil Rule No. 950 of 1923 in which it has been held that an application under O. 21, R. 90 Civil P. C. though made within the period of limitation prescribed for such an application is bad if the auction-purchaser has not been made a party therein. These two decisions, therefore, take a view contrary to that which the learned Munsif has taken and were it not for the reasons which I am about to state and on account of which I do not consider this case to be one which calls for our interference it would have been necessary for me to follow these two decisions although I may say, as I have already said, I do not agree with them. I may state here that for myself I am inclined to take the same view of an application like this as was taken of an application under S. 105, Ben Ten. Act, in the case of Bir Bikram Kishore v. Ambika Charan (8).

The considerations which weigh with me in not interfering with the order that has been passed are, firstly, that an error on a question of limitation is not necessarily such an error as would bring the case within the purview of S. 115, Civil P. C., secondly, the auction-purchaser in the present case is the Sadar Naib of the decree-holder and was looking after the execution proceedings all along on behalf of the decree-holder as appears clearly from a vakalatnama which was filed in the execution proceedings on behalf of the decree-holder and to which my attention has been drawn and, thirdly, the findings of the Courts below on the question of the service of the processes and sale proclamation and generally on the question of the proceedings held in connexion with the sale clearly go to show that a fraud was perpetrated on the judgment-debtors by the decree-holder and presumably also in collusion with the auction-purchaser who is but an officer of the decree-holder. In such a case as this merely because there has been an error on the part of the Munsif with regard to the view that may be taken on the question of limitation aforesaid, if really there has been any error at all, I do not think this is a fit case in which this Court should exercise its powers of revision. I am accordingly of opinion that this rule should be discharged, but I would make no order as to costs.

Tarini Kanta Roy and another—Respondents.

Appeal No. 246 of 1925, Decided on 15th June 1927, from original order of Sub-Judge, Rajshahi, D/- 24-3-1925.

Civil P. C., O. 34, Rr. 14, 15—Suit for contribution by a co-mortgagor after redemption of mortgage—Separate suit for attachment and sale of property charged with the amount of contribution is not necessary—T. P. Act, S. 95.

Property mortgaged by co-mortgagors was freed from liability to attachment by one co-mortgagor under the mortgage decree and he brought a suit to obtain contribution from the other owners of the mortgaged property. A decree was passed in the contribution suit, and in order to obtain execution of that decree an application was presented by the co-mortgagor for leave to execute the decree by selling the properties of the other owners to the extent to which under the decree they were proportionately liable to contribution.

Held: that it was not necessary to bring a separate suit under Rr. 14 and 15, O. 34, to effect the sale of the said property, but the sale could be effected in execution of the present decree :

Mohun Chaudhury—for Appellant

Nath Chaudhury—for Respondents.

Page, J.—This is an appeal from an order of the learned Subordinate Judge of Rajshahi allowing the opposite party's objection to certain properties being attached in execution of a decree, and ordering the properties to be released from attachment. Defendants 1 and 2 mortgaged some properties including the property in suit to defendant 6 on 19th May 1912. On 26th January 1914 the appellant purchased the properties set out in schedule Ka in execution of a money decree against defendants 1 and 2. A mortgage suit was then brought by the mortgagee to enforce his mortgage and some other property belonging to the mortgagors and subject to the mortgage was sold in execution of the mortgage decree. The appellant as the auction-purchaser of part of the property mortgaged comprised in schedule Ka, was anxious to save the property still unsold from being put up to auction in execution of the mortgage decree, and on 19th September 1916 deposited in Court the full amount remaining due under the mortgage decree. Thereupon the properties still unsold which had been subject to the mortgage were freed from liability to attachment under the mortgage decree.

Now, pursuant to the rights given to him under S. 95, T. P. Act, the appellant brought a suit to obtain contribution from the other owners of the mortgaged property freed from liability to the mortgagee. That suit was numbered 510 of 1919.

On 21st January 1921 the contesting respondent to this appeal one Tarini Kanta Roy purchased Sarat Sundari Debi defendant 1's $\frac{1}{3}$ rd share of property No.
2 in Sch. Ka. On 27th July 1923 a decree was passed in the contribution suit, and in order to obtain execution of that decree an application was presented by the appellant in respect of which the present appeal arises. The application was for leave to execute the decree by selling the properties of the other owners to the extent to which under the decree they were proportionately liable to contribution. One of those properties was the $\frac{1}{3}$ rd share of property No. 2 of Sch. Ka which belonged to Sarat Sundari, and which had been purchased by Tarini.
Tarini objected to execution being levied in respect of the property which he had bought from Sarat Sundari, and his objection was upheld by the order against which the present appeal is preferred.
Tarini based his objection to execution being levied upon the share in the property mortgaged that he had bought from Sarat Sundari upon three grounds. The learned vakil who appeared for the respondents urged that in the circumstances disclosed in the evidence the Court ought to hold, whatever the legal position might be, that the appellant must be taken to have released the property in dispute from any liability to contribute towards the liquidation of the mortgage debt and the learned vakil, while admitting that the release did not amount to an estoppel, claimed that it must be held that the appellant had forgone any right which he might have had to obtain contribution from Tarini's property. In my opinion, there is no substance in this contention as will be seen as soon as the relevant facts are stated. It appears that the appellant was the holder of an interest in a jote under which the property was held a share of which was purchased by Tarini, and after Tarini's purchase on 21st January 1921 Tarini went to his landlord, that is the appellant and asked him if he would allow mutation of names in his Sherista. It was agreed that there should be mutation of names in the Sherista upon Tarini paying a Selami of Rs 200 and four years' arrears of rent.

It is in those circumstances that the learned vakil contended that the Court ought to hold that the appellant had agreed to forgo any right that he might have in respect of any other charge upon the property. It is quite obvious that no such inference reasonably can be drawn. Tarini purchased the share belonging to Sarat Sundari with full knowledge of all the facts, for he was a party to the contribution suit, and whether there was a charge or whether there was not a charge as alleged upon this property it was necessary that Tarini should obtain a mutation of names in the Sherista. There was no evidence whatever to support the contention that it was made a term of Tarini assenting to become a tenant and to pay the sums that I have mentioned that any other charge upon the property which the appellant might have should be released. That contention, therefore, fails.

The learned vakil further urged that the appellant was in a dilemma. Either the decree in the contribution suit was a personal decree against the parties against whom the decree was made, or it was a decree granting a charge upon the property for the amount for which the property was held liable to contribute. If it was merely a personal decree against the defendants the property of the objector could not be attached in execution. If it was a decree imposing a charge upon the property and not merely for money, then, it could not be enforced by way of sale in the present suit, but must be made the subject of a second suit. The ground upon which this contention was based was that under O. 34, Rr 14 and 15, it was clear that the legislature intended that before the mortgaged property was brought to sale the mortgagor, or mortgagors if there were more than one, should have an opportunity of redeeming the property before it passed by way of sale out of the hands of its former owner, and the learned vakil in this connexion referred to two cases : Abhoyessury Dabee v. Gouri Sun- kar Panday (1) and Gobind Chandra Pal v. Karlash Chandra Pal (2). The learned vakil for the appellant has contended that there is a difference between a suit upon a mortgage which had developed in the present proceedings and a suit upon a charge not amounting to a mortgage, which was the case in each of the two authorities to which the learned vakil referred.

Where a suit is brought against several co-obligors upon a bond for the purpose of obtaining a declaration that there was a charge upon the property secured by the bond no doubt an opportunity should be given to the co-obligors to redeem the debt secured by the bond, and so to release the property. But in the present case the ratio upon which it has been held in the decisions referred to above that it is incumbent to bring a separate suit is absent, for in the present case a mortgage suit was brought, and in that mortgage suit the co-mortgagors were each of them in a position in which if they elected to do so, they could redeem the mortgaged property by paying the mortgage debt. The predecessor of Tarini, to the extent to which she was a mortgagor of the interest purchased by Tarini although she had the opportunity to do so, elected not to redeem the property.

This opportunity having been given to the mortgagors and the appellant alone having availed himself of the chance of redemption open to all the co-mortgagors now brings a suit for contribution, and, assuming that the decree was not a mere personal decree for money against the defendants, but also declared a proportionate charge which attached to the several properties, in my opinion, the two cases upon which the learned vakil for the respondents relied are inapplicable. The third contention raised on behalf of the respondents, therefore, becomes material, namely, was this decree a mere money decree, or was it also a decree under which the several properties were proportionately charged with the amounts due for contribution? The plaint in the suit has not been printed in the paper-book, but reference has been made to it and it does not appear from the plaint (so far as we are in a position to understand it), that any specific claim was made that a charge should be laid upon the properties liable to contribution.

(2) [1916] 25 C. L. J. 354=40 I. C. 230.

But in order to enable us to understand the decree we have been referred to the judgment in the suit which is in the printed paper-book, and, in my opinion, it is clear beyond doubt or controversy that the decree in the contribution suit did impose not merely a personal obligation upon the defendants against whom the decree was passed, but also a proportionate charge upon the properties liable to contribution. It is enough to say that in more passages than one the learned Subordinate Judge emphasizes the importance of bearing in mind that the liability attaches to the property and not to the person, and, as the mortgage charge is indivisible and attaches to the property, every person who holds the property must contribute.

In dealing with issue 12, which relates to the relief to which the plaintiff is entitled, the learned Subordinate Judge specifically states that there is to be a charge upon the properties, and he takes the opportunity of specifically laying down the contribution chargeable to each of the several properties liable to contribute. The decree recites what the plaintiff's claim is, and after stating in detail the several sums which the plaintiff claims as payable by the owners of the several properties respectively proceeds to state that the plaintiff reserved a lien for the said sums on the respective properties set out in the schedule and held by the defendants. Coming to the operative part of the decree, "it is ordered and decreed that this suit be decreed with costs," and although no special reference is made to the word "charge," it is, to my mind, abundantly clear that the learned Judge by this decree declared and imposed a proportionate charge upon the property liable to contribution to be paid by each of the properties respectively. It follows, therefore, in my judgment, that the application for execution was well-founded, and that the objection of Tarini was misconceived. The order will be that the order of the learned Subordinate Judge be discharged that the objection of the respondent Tarini be dismissed, and that the application of the plaintiff-appellant for leave to issue execution be granted. The appeal, therefore, in this sense will be allowed with costs in both the Courts—the hearing-fee in this Court being assessed at three gold mohurs. The application is dismissed without costs.

Appeal No. 1141 of 1924, Decided on 25th November 1926, from appellate decree of 2nd Sub-Judge, Backergunj, D/- 27th February 1924.

Whenever a landlord sues for ejectment of a tenant on the ground that he has broken a condition in the lease, he is bound to follow the procedure laid down in S. 155, as there is nothing in S. 155 or in general law to hold that because a tenant commits an act in breach of the terms of the tenancy, he ceases to be a tenant within the meaning of S. 155. He continues to be a tenant until he is declared by a Court of justice that he has forfeited his tenancy and is liable to be ejected: 29 C. L. J. 40, Foll.; 24 C. L. J. 40, Dist. [P 194 C 1, 2]

In a lease creating a miras karsha there was a covenant that if the tenant transferred the holding without the landlord's consent, the landlord would have the right of re-entry. The tenant sold the holding to another person and continued to remain in possession as a sub-lessee under him. In a suit brought by the landlord,

Held: that the suit was not maintainable in view of S. 155 without serving a notice on the tenant [P 195 C 1; P 196 C 1]

A landlord is not entitled to treat a holding abandoned where the original tenant is in possession as a sub-lessee without some act of repudiation of tenancy to him: A. I. R. 1924 Cal. 647, Foll.; 24 C. L. J. 40, Dist. [P 195 C 1, 2]

Suhrawardy, J.—In a lease executed by defendant 4 in favour of the landlords whose interest has now devolved upon the plaintiffs, creating a miras karsha, there was a covenant that if the tenant transferred the holding without the landlord's consent the landlord would have the right of re-entry. In 1926 defendant 4 sold the holding to defendant 1 who purchased it in the benami of defendant 2. Thereafter the plaintiffs brought the present suit for recovery of khas possession of the holding on the ground of breach of the covenant and also of abandonment. The defence was that defendant 4 was not aware of the stipulation in the lease and that she had a permanent transferable interest in the holding. The most important question raised at the trial was whether the plaintiff's suit was maintainable in view of S. 155, Ben. Ten. Act. There was also a denial of abandonment inasmuch as defendant 4 had taken a sublease from the purchaser (defendant 1) of the holding in suit. The Munsif found both the points in favour of the plaintiffs and gave them a decree. On appeal the learned Subordinate Judge has reversed the findings of the Munsif on these two points and dismissed the plaintiff's claim for khas possession allowing them a decree declaring their title to the oshat nimhowla and mirasijara claimed by them and further declaring that defendant 4 had no right to transfer the holding in suit.

The plaintiffs have appealed and it is argued on their behalf that the view of law taken by the learned Subordinate Judge on the two vital points raised in the case viz., the application of S. 155, Ben. Ten. Act, and the abandonment by defendant 4 are erroneous.

With regard to the first point: the question that falls for determination is whether a case of breach of covenant giving the right of re-entry to the landlord is covered by S. 155, Ben. Ten. Act, and makes it compulsory on the landlord in suing on the covenant for recovery of khas possession to serve a notice upon the tenant under that section. That a covenant which gives the landlord the right of re-entry, on the tenant transferring the holding, is subject to the provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Act, cannot be doubted. It has been held that even if there be such a covenant under which the landlord can take possession of the holding without the intervention of the Court, he is unable to do so by virtue of S. 89, Ben. Ten. Act: Buddhimanta Paramanik v. Sarat Chandra (1). S. 155, so far as it is relevant to the present purpose, says that a suit for ejectment of a tenant, on the ground that he has broken a condition on breach of which he is, under the terms of a contract between him and the landlord, liable to ejectment, shall not be entertained unless the landlord has served, in the prescribed manner, a notice on the tenant specifying the particular breach complained of prima facie, and giving their natural meaning to the words of the section it is clear that, whenever a landlord sues for ejectment of a tenant, he is bound to follow the procedure laid down in S. 155, Ben. Ten. Act. But, on the authority of the decision in the case of Dwarka Nath v. Mathura Nath (2) it is argued that where a tenant holding under a lease covenanting against alienation sells the tenancy he ceases to be a tenant and, therefore, S. 155, Ben. Ten. Act is not applicable in his case.

The high authority of the decision has made it incumbent upon me to look very closely into the law and the reasoning which induced their Lordships to hold the view expressed therein. With very great respect I do not find anything either in S. 155 or in the general law to hold that because a tenant commits an act in breach of the terms of the tenancy, he ceases to be a tenant within the meaning of S. 155. He continues to be a tenant until he is declared by a Court of justice that he has forfeited his tenancy and is liable to be ejected: S. 89, Ben. Ten. Act. The view taken by one of the learned Judges in that case seems to be otherwise, but the wording of S. 155 is so general and clear that it cannot be questioned that the application of the section does not depend upon the nature of the covenant the breach of which is complained of but it applies to every case where the landlord sues the tenant for ejectment even though on the allegation that he has forfeited his tenancy on account of the breach of a covenant in the lease. It is not necessary to dwell further upon this point because the ratio decidendi of the case Dwarka Nath v. Mathura Nath (2) is not applicable in the present case. The learned Chief Justice held that the purchaser from a tenant under disability as regards transfer is a trespasser and, therefore, he cannot rely on S. 155, Ben. Ten. Act, which is not applicable to one in his position. Mookerjee, J., based his judgment more on this fact than on any other. He observes:

(1) [1910] 13 C. L. J. 672=6 I. C. 147.

(2) [1916] 24 C. L. J. 40=34 I. C. 833=21 C. W. N. 117.

In the case before us it is, in my opinion, plain that no title passed to the defendant 1 by the execution sale; the landlord has not waived forfeiture by receipt of rent or otherwise; and the forfeiture must be held to have taken effect from the date of sale. Defendant 1 thus cannot take advantage of S. 155, Ben. Ten. Act, as he is not a tenant but a trespasser. The original tenants are quite content with the decree for ejectment and do not claim to be relieved against forfeiture.

This view does not commend itself to me inasmuch as the plaintiffs sue for recovery of possession and they must prove, even in the presence of a trespasser, that they have obtained the right to recover possession by following the procedure as laid down in law. In view of the facts of the present case we need not consider this question further. Defendant 4, the original tenant, has appeared in his suit and objected to the plaintiff's recovering possession of the holding. In this connexion we prefer to follow the ruling in the case of Afiladdi v. Satish Chandra Bannerji (3), where the learned Judges held that S. 155, Ben. Ten. Act applies to every case of breach such as breach of covenant against alienation. In this view I am of opinion that the view taken by the learned Subordinate Judge that the plaintiff's present suit is barred under S. 155, Ben. Ten. Act, is correct.

With regard to the second question, that is, abandonment, the Subordinate Judge has found that defendant 4 is still in possession of the land; she was sued for rent by the plaintiffs for a period after the transfer, and there is no evidence that there was any repudiation of the tenancy by defendant 4. On these grounds he held that there was no abandonment in law. With regard to the second ground as regards the suit for rent, he is not quite precise. The sale by defendant 4 was on 22nd Kartick 1326, and the suit for rent was for the years 1323 to 1326 Pous. There was an overlapping of a few months only and there is nothing to show that the plaintiffs were aware of the sale by defendant 4 to defendant 1, before they brought the rent suit. The other ground seems to me on the authorities to support the view of the lower appellate Court. In Monmatha Kumar v. Josada Lal (4), it is said that a landlord is not entitled to treat a holding abandoned where the original tenant is in possession as a sub-lessee without some act of repudiation of tenancy by him. I am not prepared to accept the view without further consideration as it would seem that the very fact of the tenant transferring the whole of the holding to a stranger and attorning to him, is sufficient evidence of repudiation of tenancy under the original landlord. But I am not at present disposed to differ from the view taken in that case and the other cases which it has followed. I must, therefore, hold that the judgment of the lower appellate Court is substantially correct and must be upheld. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Cammiade, J.—The finding of the Subordinate Judge regarding the status of the defendant who has transferred his interest is that that defendant's interest was a nontransferable occupancy holding. The case has been argued before us on that footing both sides having accepted that finding. The suit was instituted by the plaintiffs for ejectment of both the transferor and the transferee from the land of the holding. The question is how such ejectment may be effected. The grounds on which the ejectment is prayed for are: firstly, that there was a breach of covenant against alienation in which there is a proviso for re-entry by the landlord; secondly that the tenant has abandoned the holding. With regard to the relief sought on the first ground the question is whether or not the vendor is still to be considered a tenant for the purpose of the suit for ejectment. In the first place, the provisions of S. 155, Ben. Ten. Act, undoubtedly relate to all cases of breaches of conditions which create forfeiture of tenancies and render the tenants liable to ejectment, and therefore covenants restraining alienation must be held to be included within the scope of the section. A further consideration is that the tenancy being an occupancy holding unless the relationship of landlord and tenant is determined by some act on the part of the contracting parties or by operation of law that relationship continues and the vendor must therefore be a tenant till he is ejected under the provisions of S. 155, Ben. Ten. Act. For these reasons I am entirely in agreement with the view expressed by a Bench of this Court in Afiladdi v. Satish Chandra (3). In that case also as in the present one the tenant who had sold the holding which was also an occupancy holding had remained in possession by taking a sub-lease from his vendee; and it seems to me, specially in cases of this nature, that there can be no doubt the notice required by S. 155 (1) is necessary before a tenant can be ejected. In the case of Dwarka Nath v. Mathura Nath (2), it appears that the tenants had vacated the land, and took no interest in the result of the suit for ejectment, and therefore as the purchaser who was the only contesting party was a trespasser, as far as he was concerned, no notice was necessary.

(3) [1916] 29 C. L. J. 40=34 I. C. 497.

(4) A. I. R. 1924 Cal. 647.

The other ground on which ejectment has been sought cannot be supported, on the rulings of this Court in various cases Monmatha Kumar Kay v. Jasoda Lal Podder (4); Siperunnessa Bibi v. Ramdeb Rai (5) and Madar Mondal v. Mahima Chandra Mazumdar (6). In all these cases it has been held that there a non-transferable occupancy holding is sold by the raiyat, who after transfer takes sub-lease from the vendee and continues in possession, there is no abandonment of the land, and there is nothing in the mere act of transfer to show any intention either to abandon the holding or to repudiate the relationship of landlord and tenant. This being the view held by this Court in various cases, we are bound to follow that view. I accordingly agree with my learned brother that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This appeal is by defendant 1 against a portion of the decree of the Subordinate Judge and arises out of a suit for maintenance brought by the plaintiff, a Hindu widow, out of the estate left by her deceased husband. Defendant 1 was the son of her husband by another wife. There were other defendants in the suit who were joint in mess with her husband, but they have no concern with this appeal as the suit was dismissed against them. The plaintiff sued as a pauper and her claim was for future maintenance at the rate of Rs 30 per month for herself and at the rate of Rs 15 per month for the minor daughter she had by her husband. There was also a claim for arrears of maintenance for six years and three months which was valued at Rs. 4,444 odd. The future maintenance was valued at Rs. 5,400. All the defendants contested the suit. The plaintiff brought another suit for some ornaments alleged to have been kept with the defendants. We are not concerned with that suit in the present appeal which was dismissed by the lower Court. The suit with which we are concerned was defended on various grounds and a large number of issues were framed on the defence set up by the defendants. It is not necessary to mention all of them. But it may be stated that the defence was that the plaintiffs' claim for maintenance was barred on the grounds of estoppel, acquiescence and waiver, and as regards the past maintenance it was barred by limitation. Then it was urged that the plaintiff was not entitled to separate maintenance apparently on the ground that her husband at the time of his death made some injunction to that effect. It was also stated in defence that the arrears of maintenance could not be charged against the property and so forth. The learned Subordinate Judge decided all the issues against the defence and held that the plaintiff was compelled to leave the dwelling house of her deceased husband on account of quarrels and oppression on her by another lady, her husband's elder brother's wife, and that defendant 1 who was at the time student, connived at the oppressions exercised by that lady upon the plaintiff. The result was that the plaintiff had to leave her house and to take shelter under her brother.

Under these circumstances, she asked for maintenance from out of the estate left by her husband. The next question which the learned Subordinate Judge took up for decision was what should be the rate of the maintenance. He considered, no doubt, upon the evidence given by one of the plaintiffs' witnesses, that costs for plaintiffs' board per month might be Rs. 8 or Rs. 9 and he took into consideration the fact that Re. 1 only would be the cost per month for her clothing and Rs. 1 per month for her bratas and the other religious rites. Taking all these into consideration, he fixed the maintenance at the rate of Rs. 10 per month and also the maintenance on account of her infant daughter at Rs. 6 per month. The annual income of the property left by the husband has been found to be approximately Rs. 900 per year. The maintenance, therefore, allowed to the widow and to her infant daughter, amount to Rs. 192 per year, only a small fraction of the total income. The Subordinate Judge, however, in considering the question of the arrears reduced this amount at the rate of Rs. 10 per month and gave only a decree for six years to the extent of Rs. 720. But in making the order for costs, the Subordinate Judge directed that the plaintiff would recover proportionate costs for the suit from defendant 1 only and Government would recover Court-fee from defendant 1 which the plaintiff would have paid, if she were not permitted to sue as a pauper. The appeal of defendant 1 is directed against that part of the decree which makes him liable to pay the Court-fees with regard to the suit. The matter then stands thus. The total Court-fee payable on the claim as made by the plaintiff in her suit was Rs. 817-8-0. The amount decreed for arrears is Rs. 720 only and the valuation of the future maintenance allowed by the Subordinate Judge would amount to Rs. 1920 only. The Court-fees payable with regard to this amount would be Rs. 268-8 as. What defendant 1 complains against is that the difference between the Court-fees payable on the plaint, that is Rs. 817-8-0 and the amount of Court-fees on the sum decreed to the plaintiffs, which is Rs. 268-8-0 should not be imposed on him. This amount is Rs. 549. In support of this contention, the learned vakil for defendant 1 relies upon two cases, the earliest of which is the case of Chandra Reka v. Secy. of State (1). In that case the plaintiff was the brother of the defendant and sued her for partition of the properties which were alleged to be worth Rs. 34,000 odd. He brought the suit as a pauper. The defence was that the ancestral property was worth very little and that all the property that the plaintiff claimed was acquired by the defendant herself who was a prostitute by profession. It was found by the trial Court that the ancestral property was only worth Rs. 200 and upon that finding he made a decree in favour of the plaintiff to the extent of Rs. 100. But in making the order as to the payment of the Court-fees, he observed :

Both plaintiff and defendant 1 have lived disreputable lives—defendant 1 being a prostitute while the plaintiff was the hanger-on of a prostitute. Yet himself is a pauper and defendant 1 has acquired comparatively great wealth ; in the undefined state of the law, this induced the plaintiff to attempt to get a share, he has failed and she has succeeded in resisting his claim by setting up a disreputable defence. There is a large sum due to Government for stamp duty. In these circumstances, I think it right to direct that defendant 1 considering the nature of her defence, be ordered to pay her own costs and the stamp duty due to Government.

Under these circumstances the learned Judges held that the order of the trial Court was erroneous. As Mr. Justice Muthusami Ayyar puts it;

Notwithstanding her profession, she (appellant) has rights of property, and is entitled to the protection of law, and no penalty can lawfully be imposed upon her for pleading what is found to be substantially true to entitle her to such protection.

To my mind, there cannot be any analogy to the case before us with reference to the case in the Madras High

(1) [1891] 14 Mad. 163.

Court. In my judgment, the District Judge in that case quite wrongly made the order in the exercise of his discretion, simply because the defendant acquired the property by her disreputable mode of life. This case, therefore, can be of no assistance to us in deciding the present question which has been raised by the learned vakil for the appellant. But that cannot be said with regard to the other case, Ganga Dahal Rai v. Mt. Ganra (2), on which the learned vakil relies. In its facts the Allahabad case bears a great resemblance to the case before us. There the plaintiff had to bring a suit for maintenance claiming Rs. 40 per month. The Court allowed only Rs. 5 per month, but directed the defendant to bear the costs actually incurred by the plaintiff and further directed the Collector to realize from the defendant the whole amount of Court-fees payable on the claim. The learned Judges held that the principle laid down in the case, Chandra Reka v. Secretary of State (1), was applicable to the case before them; and they further held that in that case it was decided that it was illegal to lay upon the defendant in such a suit a larger proportion of the Court-fee leviable from the plaintiff than would have been payable by the plaintiff if the claim had been limited originally to that portion which was successful.

With great respect, it seems to me that no such general rule was laid down by the learned Judges of the Madras High Court. They decided the case upon its facts and they were of opinion that the reason for which the District Judge in that case made the defendant liable for the Court-fees could not be supported on the ground on which she was made so liable. The learned Judges of the Allahabad High Court observe at p. 473:

The question of the discretion of the Court in dealing with a matter of this sort, i. e., with a case in which a pauper plaintiff has partially succeeded and partially failed, is perhaps one which deserves to be dealt with by a special rule.

I must again observe with very great respect that the discretion given to the Court under R. 10, O. 33, Civil P. C., is quite sufficient for the purpose, and the Court may, in the exercise of its discretion having regard to the circumstances of the case, mould its decree according to what the justice of the case requires with reference to the Court-fees payable. The words in the last portion of the rule run thus:

... such amount shall be recoverable by the Government from any party ordered by the decree to pay the same.

This, to my mind, leaves the discretion entirely with the Court to direct which of the parties should pay the Court-fees due to the Government. Dealing with the equities of the case the learned Judges of the Allahabad High Court make this observation:

In an ordinary litigation the defendant has some protection against any extravagant exaggeration of his claim on the part of the plaintiff who knows that he has a good case for some relief, in the fact that the plaintiff is bound to pay out of his own pocket in the first instance the whole of the Court-fee leviable on the plaint as drafted. It is otherwise in the case of a suit brought by a pauper plaintiff and it would not be equitable to permit such a plaintiff to penalize the defendant by exaggerating his claim.

I have nothing to add with reference to this observation to what I have already stated that the Court has been given ample discretion in the matter by the rule I have already cited; and the equities of a particular case must be considered by the Court in making the order. No hard-and-fast rule can be laid down with regard to the equities of such a case as this. Take for an example the case of a person in the position of the plaintiff. The widow of a member of the joint family has no means whatsoever of knowing what is the annual income of her husband's share in the property. When all the people were living together she was probably in affluent circumstances. During the lifetime of her husband, all her wants had been met; but when she had to leave the family house, she has been held to be bound to maintain herself on the paltry sum of Rs. 10 per month. How is she to know that the claim which she made of Rs. 30 was unduly exaggerated? The income of the husband's estate being Rs. 900 per year, and he having left only an adult son besides herself and her infant daughter she could reasonably have thought that the maintenance for the widow and the daughter might have been much more than what has been allowed by the Court, and in such a case as this, to my mind, it is iniquitous to saddle her with the costs of the Court-fees. The defendant resisted her entire claim, and pleaded that she was not entitled to a single rupee for maintenance. It is unnecessary for me to dilate further on this point and I can only repeat that in my judgment the matter is entirely left to the discretion of the Court which must make the appropriate order having regard to the facts of each particular case. With great respect I am, therefore, unable to agree in the decision of the learned Judges of the Allahabad High Court in the case referred to above. It is, next urged by the learned vakil for the appellant that in this case the Subordinate Judge has not given any reasons for the exercise of his discretion and his order is, therefore, liable to be set aside on appeal. It is true that the discretion of the Court must be exercised with reference to the facts of each particular case, as I have already stated, but no materials have been given to us in this case in order to enable us to decide that the discretion has been wrongly exercised. The evidence with regard to the case has not been printed, and we are, therefore, unable to say that the Subordinate Judge has not exercised his proper discretion in making defendant 1 liable for the Court-fees. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

We have been referred to the cross-objection preferred by the plaintiff-respondent. Although, in the course of his argument, the learned vakil for the respondent stated that the amount of the maintenance for the plaintiff and her daughter had been fixed at a low figure, we are unable to give her any assistance, as the cross-objection is not directed against the future maintenance allowed by the Court. The only objection that is preferred is with regard to the disallowance of maintenance of Rs. 6 per month which he has given to the minor daughter for the arrears. The reason given by the Subordinate Judge does not commend itself to me, as he says that the lady was maintained by her brother in his family during the period for which the arrears of her past maintenance are claimed. We are not aware of the circumstances of the brother; and because she had to live with her brother, there is no reason for disallowing the full rate allowed for maintenance or cutting it down to six years only. In my opinion, she ought to be allowed the past maintenance for 6 years and 3 months, that is, the period of the claim at the rate of Rs 16 per month. The cross-objection to the extent of Rs. 480 is, therefore, allowed with costs. The Court-fees for this has been paid by the respondent and she is entitled to recover it from the appellant.

Hearing-fees both in the appeal and the cross-objection is assessed at three gold mohurs each Appeal No. 231 of 1926, Decided on 31st March 1927, from appellate order of Dist. Judge, Nadia, D/- 20th March 1926.

Civil P. C., O. 1, Rr. 1 and 3, and O. 2, R. 3—Plaintiff suing to recover certain properties in his personal capacity from certain defendants and to recover another property in the capacity of shebait from one of the defendants in the same suit—Plaint should be treated as comprising two suits and they should be tried separately.

Where plaintiff sued in his individual capacity as reversioners of a certain person to recover possession of the properties B, C, D and E on the death of the widow, from defendants 2 to 5 who, under a transfer from the widow and the son said to have been adopted by her or in collusion with the latter's widow, were in possession, and he also sought to recover in the same suit the property A in the capacity of shebait which belonged to the deity Nandadulal Thakur and which was in the possession of defendant 2, who claimed to hold it as transferee from the widow and the said adopted son:

Held: that the plaint should be treated as comprising two suits, one at the instance of the plaintiff as shebait of the deity Nandadulal Thakur in respect of property A and the other at the instance of the plaintiff in his personal capacity in respect of the properties B, C, D and E and the two suits should be separately tried: (English and Indian cases, Ref.).

Mukerji, J.—The plaint in this suit relates to five items of properties, which for the sake of convenience may be called A, B, C, D, and E. The plaintiff claims to be the reversionary heir of one Rashbehari Goswami. He also claims to be the shebait of the deity Nandadulal Thakur, installed by the ancestors of the said Rashbehari Goswami, on the ground that according to the rule and practice prevailing in the family, from the time of his ancestors, the shebaitship has all along vested in the heirs according to the law of inheritance. The plaint states that Rashbehari Goswami left a widow Tarini Debi, and one Susil Kumar alias Sachindra, whose widow is defendant 1, had set up a claim that he had been adopted by her as her son. The plaintiff seeks to have his title declared as owner in respect of properties B, C, D and E, and the title of the deity Nandadulal Thakur to property A and asks for recovery of possession of properties B, C, D and E as such owner and of property A as such shebait. According to the plaint properties A and B were in the possession of defendant 2, who claims to have obtained the same from Tarini Debi and Sachindra, by a conveyance and a lease respectively; property C is in the possession of defendant 3; property D is in the possession of defendant 4 and property E in the possession of defendant 5. It is alleged in the plaint that the three last-mentioned defendants were in collusion with each other and with defendant 1.

The Subordinate Judge held that the suit, in the form in which it was laid, was not maintainable. He gave the plaintiff an opportunity to elect as to how he would proceed with the suit and against which of the defendants; and on the plaintiff not having availed of the opportunity, he dismissed the suit.

The District Judge held on appeal that the suit was maintainable and remanded it for trial on the merits. Defendant 2 has then preferred this appeal.

The question of maintainability of the suit was dealt with by the Courts below from the point of view of O. 1, R. 1, O. 1, R. 3 and O. 2, R. 3, Civil P. C. The Subordinate Judge held that all the three rules have been contravened, while the District Judge has held that none of them has been infringed.

As regards properties B, C, D and E, it is clear that the plaintiff seeks to sue in his individual capacity and recover possession of the properties on the death of the widow from defendants 2 to 5 who, under a transfer from the widow and the son said to have been adopted by her or in collusion with the latter's widow, are in possession thereof. Property A belongs to the deity Nandadulal Thakur and it is in the possession of defendant 2, who claims to hold it as transferee from the widow and the said adopted son.

Order 1, R. 1 and O. 1, R. 3, Civil P. C., are in practically the same terms. They correspond to a part of O. 16, R. 1 and to O. 16, R. 4, respectively, of the English rules. Before 1896, this part of O. 16, R. 1, ran in these words :

All persons may be joined as plaintiffs in whom the right to any relief claimed is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally, or in the alternative.

In 1896 it was amended and as amended it runs thus :

All persons may be joined in one action as plaintiffs in whom any right to relief in respect of or arising out of the same transaction or series of transactions is alleged to exist, whether jointly, severally or in the alternative, where if such persons brought separate actions any common question of law or fact would arise.

Rule 4, O. 16, stands as before in these words :

All persons may be joined as defendants against whom the right to any relief is alleged to exist whether jointly, severally or in the alternative.

Two matters must now, upon the authorities, be regarded as well settled. First, O. 16 of the English Rules, though headed "parties" only, deals not only with joinder of parties but also joinder of causes of action (see the cases referred to in Ramendra Nath Roy v. Brajendra Nath Dass (1), in the judgment of Woodroffe, J., at p. 123 and of Mookerjee, J., at p. 132) : and second, though R. 4 was not amended, the alteration of R. 1 alters the effect of R. 4 and whatever construction is placed on R. 1 ought now to be applied also to R. 4. [Oesterreichische Export A. G. v. British Indemnity Insurance Co. Ltd., (2), In Re Beck (3)] and that a plaintiff is entitled to join as co-defendants persons against whom he has different causes of action in cases where common questions of law and fact are involved : Payne v. British Time Recorder Co. Ltd (4). It follows, therefore, that under R. 3, O. 1, Civil P. C., which, unlike the English R. 4, O. 16 has been amended and brought on the lines of R. 1, O. 1 Civil P. C., there is greater reason for interpreting it in that way. As regards the joinder of defendants, if the plaintiff's right to relief is in respect of, or arises out of, the same act, transaction or series of acts or transactions, whether it exists jointly, severally or in the alternative all the defendants could be joined in one action, provided that if separate suits were brought against such persons any common question of law or fact would arise. So also as regards the joinder of plaintiffs.

It has been repeatedly pointed out by the House of Lords that although the decisions, since the amendment of O. 16, R. 1, the effect of which was to widen its language, have not been always consistent nor wholly satisfactory, still the more recent decisions have tended in the right direction, namely, to show an increasing tendency to give effect to the obvious purpose of the rule. In Drincqbier v. Wood (5), Byrne, J., pointed out that "transaction" was not confined to something taking place between two parties. In Stroud v. Lawson (6). Smith, L. J., said :

According to the terms of the rule the plaintiff in this case cannot join the two causes of action which he is putting forward in different capacities, unless he can show that they both arise out of the same transaction. It is not enough for him to show that, if separate actions were brought, "a common question of law or fact would arise" for those words do not apply, unless the right to relief in each case arises out of the same transaction.

Chitty, L. J., in the same case observed :

They are, therefore, as I have said, in reality two separate plaintiffs suing in respect of two separate and distinct causes of action in this case. The question then arises whether both the causes of action arise out of the same transaction within the meaning of O. 16, R. 1 It is necessary that both these conditions should be fulfilled, that is to say, that the right to relief alleged to exist in each plaintiff should be in respect of or arise out of the same transaction, and also that there should be a common question of fact or law, in order that the case may be within the rule. . . . I do not deal with the words "series of transactions" because they were not relied upon by the plaintiff's counsel.

While Vaughan Williams, L. J., said : I do not, however, understand that by the new rule it was intended to prevent the joinder of different causes of action under it. On the contrary I understand its object to be to facilitate such joinder, and to allow plaintiffs to join different causes of action where, under the old rules as interpreted in Smurthwaite v. Hannay (7) by the House of Lords they could not do so I do not think that the rule means that the whole of a transaction must be involved in each of the causes of action joined. I think that, if there was a transaction or series of transactions in respect of which one plaintiff was interested up to a certain point, and the other plaintiffs were interested, not only up to that point, but in respect of the entire transaction or series of transactions from beginning to end, under this rule they might join their separate causes of action in one action, because there would be one transaction or series of transactions in respect of which the various plaintiffs all claimed a right to relief.

That the rule deals with joinder of causes of action as well as joinder of parties is now well settled: see Bullock v. London General Omnibus Co. (8); Compania Sansinena de Carnes Congladas v. Houlder Brothers & Co. Ltd. (9); Times Cold Storage Co. v. Lowther & Blankley (10); Oesterreichische Export A. G. v. British Indemnity Insurance Co., Ltd., (2) In Markt & Co. v. Knight Steamship Co. Ltd., (11), Fletcher Moulton, L. J., while pointing out the distinction between this rule and that which relates to a representative suit, said, with regard to this rule :

This makes it clear that (subject to the control of the Court) persons can unite as plaintiffs though seeking individual relief in cases where the investigation would to a great extent be identical in each individual case. The policy of the rule is to avoid needless expense where it can be done without injustice to anyone. And it carries out its object.

The question of joinder of plaintiffs or defendants and the meaning of R. 16, Rr. 1 and 4, have been considered lately by the Court of appeal (Lord Sterndale, M. R., Warrington, L. J., and Scrutton, L. J.) in Payne v. British Time Recorder Co. Ltd., (4) and it has been said :

Broadly speaking, where claims by or against different parties involve or may involve a common question of law or fact bearing sufficient importance in proportion to the rest of the action to render it desirable that the whole of the matters should be disposed of at the same time the Court will allow the joinder of plaintiffs or defendants, subject to its discretion as to how the action should be tried.

This is a good working rule for practical purposes and, applying it to the present case, it seems to us clear that the action as framed is justified by O. 1, Rr. 1 and 3, Civil P. C. Looking at the matter, however, from the point of view of O. 1, R. 2, we are of opinion that the trial of the suit as laid is likely to be somewhat embarrassing, especially as some of the questions that will arise so far as property A is concerned, will have no bearing upon the claim as regards properties B, C, D and E and also because the question of costs, in so far as the debt is concerned will arise, which, if possible, must be kept separate from these which the plaintiff will incur or be entitled to recover in his personal capacity.

We, accordingly, set aside the orders passed by both the Courts below and direct that the plaint be treated as comprising two suits: one at the instance of the plaintiff as shebait of the deity Nandadulal Thakur in respect of property A and the other at the instance of the plaintiff in his personal capacity in respect of the properties B, C, D, and E, and the two suits be separately tried.

We make no order as to costs in this appeal.

Mukerji, J.—This appeal arises out of certain proceedings taken at the instance of some of the judgment-debtors to set aside a rent sale. The Subordinate Judge refused to set aside the sale. The District Judge, on appeal, set it aside. The auction-purchasers have preferred this appeal.

The application to set aside the sale was under O. 21, R. 90, Civil P. C., as well as under S. 173, Cl. (3), Ben. Ten. Act. Under O. 21, R. 90, Civil P. C., it was alleged that the sale processes were not duly served, and that there was material irregularity in publishing and conducting the sale and that substantial injury in the shape of gross inadequacy of price resulted therefrom. As resting on S. 173, Cl. (3), Ben. Ten. Act, it was alleged that one of the judgment-debtors, Tahed Mahmud Mandal, in collusion with the decree-holders, managed to purchase the properties in the benami of his daughters.

The sale was held on 5th October 1923. The present application was originally filed on the date the Courts reopened after the Dusserah vacation and so within time. When so filed the auction-purchasers were not made parties therein. On 12th January 1924 the auction-purchasers were added as parties.

The Subordinate Judge held that the application must be treated as having been filed beyond time. He held that the sale processes were not proved to have been served, but that there was no reliable evidence to prove that the property was undersold. He held further that the evidence fell far short of proving that the purchase was made by Tahar Mahmud in the benami of his daughters, though there were reasons to suspect that it was the case of a benami purchase.

The District Judge, on appeal, reversed the decision of the Subordinate Judge by an order which is not very remarkable for its lucidity. He found that Tahar Mahmud had made the purchase in the names of his daughters. He held that there was material irregularity and that the price fetched was inadequate. The question of limitation he appears to have left undecided. He expressed himself somewhat loosely on this question, confusing an appeal with an application under O. 21, R. 90, Civil P. C., in these words:

As regards the appeal under O. 21, R. 90, the auction-purchasers were not made parties till after the 30 days' time allowed by the Limitation Act. The petitioners themselves alleged that they were necessary parties and it is difficult, therefore, to accept this contention that O. 21, R. 90, merely demands that the auction-purchasers should have notice before the orders are passed, without making them parties, but it appears to be a perfectly possible interpretation of O. 21, R. 92. If correct the appeal is not time barred.

The respondents have urged that no second appeal lies in this matter. The appellants seek to justify the appeal firstly on the ground that fraud was alleged by the judgment-debtors in their application for setting aside the sale and that, therefore, the question that was decided by the Subordinate Judge and the District Judge fell within S. 47 of the Code. This justification is not possible as, though a general allegation of fraud was made in the petition, the evidence that was adduced and the order that the Subordinate Judge passed dealt only with fraud in publishing or conducting the sale within the meaning of O. 21, R. 90, Civil P. C., for which only one appeal is allowed by the law. It is nextly urged on behalf of the appellants that the question raised under S. 173, Cl. (3), Ben. Ten. Act, involves a question under S. 47 of the Code and, that therefore, a second appeal is competent.

The authorities bearing upon this question are not quite uniform. It should be observed at the outset that no appeal is allowed against an order under S. 173, Cl. (3), Ben. Ten. Act, by any provision of the Act itself and this section is not included in the list of orders made appealable as such by the Civil Procedure Code. The only way in which an order under S. 173, Cl. (3), Ben. Ten. Act, may be regarded as an appealable one is by treating it as one made under S. 47, Civil P. C., and thus satisfying the definition of a "decree" under that Code and being thus appealable as such.

Mookerjee, J., discussed this question very fully in the case of Joytara v. Pran Krishna Seal (1), and observed thus:

(1) [1911] 13 C. L. J. 257=7 I. C. 769=15 C. W. N. 512.

Our attention was invited to a number of judicial decisions which are perhaps not easy to reconcile. A detailed examination of these cases is each unnecessary, as, in our opinion, an inflexible rule cannot be formulated that an order under S. 173 is or is not appealable as a decree. The test to be applied in the circumstances of each case is what is the true nature of the question raised, and who are the parties between whom it arises. The answer must depend largely upon the position of the applicant and the title he claims. We may observe, however, that there are expressions used in some of the cases in the books which may be open to criticism.

The tests which the learned Judge laid down in that case were two, viz: (1) whether the question raised in the application under S. 173 is one between the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed or their representatives; and (2) whether the question relates to the execution of the decree. The second test is obviously satisfied, as, if the objection prevails the same must be reversed and the decree-holder must proceed to execute the decree again for its satisfaction. The first test is also satisfied because, if the question arises between the parties to the suit or their representatives and relates to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree within the meaning of S. 47 of the Code, it does not cease to be a question within that section merely because the auction-purchaser, who was not a party to the suit, is a party to these proceedings. Judged by these two tests alone, the order appealed from would fall within S. 47 of the Code and the appeal before us would be competent; were the question res integra, I should have felt great difficulty in holding that the appeal before us is not maintainable.

But the authorities, which I have already said are not uniform, that have clustered round this point, have laid down certain restrictions in the matter of appeals that may be preferred from an order passed under S. 173, Cl. (3), Ben. Ten. Act. The cases of Roghu Singh v. Misri Singh (2), Chandmonee v. Samtomonee (3), Hara Bandhu v. Harish Chandra (4), Hira Lal v. Chundra Kanta (5), Amir Rai v. Basde Siagh (6), Sriram Chandra Singh v. Guru Das Kundu (7), and Mohima Chandra v. Jog- endra Kumar (8), have been discussed in in the judgment of Mookerjee, J., in Joytara v. Pran Krishna Seal (1). Of these the more important ones and bearing directly upon the case before us are Chandmonee v. Santamonee (4), Sriram Chunder Singh v. Guru Das Kundu (7), Mahima Chandra v. Jogendra Kumar (8), and Hira Lal v. Chandra Kanta (5). In the first of these cases the application was made by one of the judgment-debtors and the heirs of a deceased judgment-debtor on the allegation that a third judgment-debtor had purchased the property in the name of his wife; it was held that from an order setting aside the sale under S. 173, Beng. Ten. Act, no appeal lay at the instance of the auction-purchaser. In the second case the application was by the judgment-debtors and the appeal also was by them; it was held that the appeal lay on behalf of the judgment-debtors, though it would not lie on behalf of a third party. In the third case, the application was by a judgment-debtor and it was held that when there was an order under S. 173, Beng. Ten. Act, an appeal would not lie at the instance of the auction-purchaser. In the fourth case it was pointed out that the question of a right to a second appeal does not turn upon who may happen to be the appellant, but upon whether or not the case is one within S. 244 of the Code. This last-mentioned principle has evidently been ignored so far as the present question is concerned in the first three cases. There are other cases of this Court in which an appeal at the instance of the auction-purchaser has been held to be incompetent e. g., Durlav Pradhan v. Mahomed Mainuddin Bepari (9) and Jadav Chandra v. Joy Gopal (10), in the latter of which cases Coxe, J. on a review of the authorities said that the matter is no longer res integra, but the point must now be regarded as settled.

Whatever may be my own opinion on the propriety or correctness of the proposition that no appeal would lie at the instance of the auction-purchaser I feel bound to follow the long series of decisions to which I have referred and following them I must hold that the appeal before us is not maintainable. The appeal accordingly is dismissed.

We have been then asked to deal with the order of the District Judge in revision. The ground on which we are asked to do so is that his decision on the question of limitation is wrong. My own view of this question I have had occasion to express in Satish Chandra De v. Rakhal Chandra (11), but, assuming that I am not right in the view that I entertain, I am not prepared, upon the findings of fact which the learned Judge has recorded, to interfere with his decision merely because he may have taken an erroneous view of law on the question of limitation. This application accordingly must be rejected. As regards the appeal: in view of the unsatisfactory character of the order appealed from each party will bear their own costs.

B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff. The suit was for accounts against the principal defendant 1 for the period of his service under the plaintiff as gomasta. The other defendants were made parties as they are the representatives of one Mahendra Nath Roy who was the surety for defendant 1. A preliminary decree was made on 11th March 1922. The final decree was made by the Subordinate Judge on 25th April 1923. In making the final decree the Subordinate Judge found that the plaintiff was entitled to get from defendant 1, Rs. 2,000 odd for not accounting for moneys received on behalf of the plaintiff. The final decree was made by him against defendants 1 to 8. It was directed that if the money was not paid by defendant 1 within a month of the date of the decree the plaintiff would be entitled to realize the money by the sale of the property hypothecated by the surety bond and if the entire sum was not realized by that, the balance was to be recovered from any property left by Mahendra Nath Roy in the hands of defendants 2 to 8. Defendants 2 to 8 appealed against that decree. The District Judge on appeal reversed the decision of the Subordinate Judge holding that under the provisions of S. 131, Contract Act, the death of the surety operated as a revocation of the contract of guarantee so far as regards all future transactions. I ought here to state that the surety bond entered into by defendant 1 and Mahendra Nath Roy was dated 27th March 1914. Mahendra Nath Roy died on 10th August 1914. The learned Judge found that defendant 1 had not committed any act of default during the life-time of Mahendra Nath Roy. He held that, if there had been any default by defendant 1 during the life-time of Mahendra Nath Roy, the other defendants would be liable for the amount; but, inasmuch as it had been found that defendant 1 was not guilty of any default during the life-time of the surety, defendants 2 to 8 were not at all liable. Against that decree the plaintiff appeals to this Court.

The contention on behalf of the plaintiff-appellant is, first, that the contract of guarantee in this case is a continuing guarantee. Reliance has been placed in support of this contention on the case of Sen v. Bank of Bengal (1). In that case their Lordships doubted whether there was any contract of guarantee at all. They, however, expressed the opinion that in that case there was only one transaction, that is, the appointment of the principal to a place of trust and the pledging of the security deposited with the bank. That seems to take the present case out of the ruling in that case as there was no continuing guarantee. The present case, however, comes within the purview of S. 129, Contract Act III. (a) to that section is exactly like the transaction in the present case. Here defendant 1 was appointed for the purpose of collecting rents of the plaintiff's zamindari and Mahendra Nath Roy held himself responsible for the due collection and payment by defendant 1 of those rents to the extent of Rs. 600 by a security bond executed by him.

This illustration I may refer to for the purpose of construing the section. It was held by their Lordships in the case of Mahomed Syedol Ariffin v. Yeoh Ooi Gark (2) that it is the duty of the Court to accept, if that can be done, illustrations given under the section as being of value in the construction of the text; it would require a special case to warrant their rejection on the ground of repugnancy with the section. In my opinion, therefore, the present contract of the surety is a continuing guarantee. That being so, the relationship between the parties after the death of the surety must be governed by the provisions of S. 131, Contract Act. The learned vakil for the appellant has relied upon two English cases in support of his contention that the death of the surety did not amount to a revocation of the contract of surety. The cases referred to were Lloyds v. Harper (3) and In re Sil- vester (4). The rule in England, however, is quite different from the provisions of the Indian Contract Act. The law in England has been thus summarized in De Colyar on Guarantees, 3rd edn., p. 392 :

With respect to subsequent transactions and liabilities, whether a guarantee is revoked by the death of the surety depends, it would seem, upon the nature of the guarantee given. If it be a guarantee which the surety could himself have determined by notice, then it appears that the notice of his death will operate as a revocation. But if, on the other hand, the surety could not himself have put an end to the guarantee by notice, then his death does not revoke the instrument, nor does it extinguish his liability thereunder.

It has also been similarly summarized in Rowlatt on Principal and Surety, 2nd edn., at p. 87. It is stated thus :

Revocation by notice of death of the guarantor, however, can only take place when the guarantee is such as, apart from special stipulation, might have been revoked by the guarantor himself at any moment.

Under S. 130, Contract Act a continuing guarantee may be revoked as to future transactions by the surety by notice at any moment. The provisions of S. 131, Contract Act, run thus :

The death of the surety operates, in the absence of any contract to the contrary, as a revocation of a continuing guarantee, so far as regards future transactions.

As I read the section the provision is, that unless there is any contract to the contrary the death of the surety operates as a revocation of a continuing guarantee. So in each case the contract between the parties must be looked into in order to determine whether the contract of the surety has been revoked by the death of the surety or not. If from the contract it can be gathered either from the express provisions contained in it or by necessary implication, that there was a contract that the death of the surety would not operate as a revocation, then the contract of guarantee must be held to continue even after the death of the surety. It would be otherwise if no such agreement can be discovered in the contract of the surety. In the present case the security bond was executed by Nagendra Nath Mukerji, defendant 1, and Mahendra Nath Roy, the surety. The important portion of the security bond with regard to this point runs thus : and shall be bound by all the debts incurred by him. If the said Nagendra Nath Mukerji does not voluntarily pay up his debts and render account of the works done by him during his incumbency and make over the papers, or if he fails to do the same then I shall pay the same out of my own pocket, and if I do not pay it voluntarily you shall be at liberty to bring a suit against us and realize the amount by causing the mortgaged properties mentioned in the schedule below to be attached and sold at auction. To that the heirs and legal representatives of none of us both parties shall be entitled to raise any objection or plea.

Towards the end of the bond, it is further stated :

Our heirs and legal representatives shall be bound by the terms of this security bond in the same way in which we are bound by them.

From these terms it seems to be clear to me that the surety bound himself as well as his heirs and legal representatives by the terms of the contract entered into between him and the plaintiff for standing as surety for defendant 1. There is in this contract, as contemplated under S. 131, Contract Act, the stipulation that the representatives of Mahendra Nath Roy would be bound for any act done by defendant 1 during the continuance of his service even after the death of Mahendra Nath Roy. The learned Judge below in his judgment overlooked the last provision of the bond, which I have already cited. Probably, on account of that omission his judgment has been in favour of the defendants. The next point that has been urged on behalf of the appellant is that the question of the liability of the defendants for the period of defendant 1's service, after the death of the surety, Mahendra Nath Roy, could not have been raised by them before the District Judge on appeal from the final decree. The argument on his behalf is that the defendants raised in their written statement the question of their non-liability for the period after the death of Mahendra Nath Roy. Upon that an issue was raised which runs thus :

Are properties of the late Mahendra Nath Roy liable for the debt of defendant 1? If so, for what amount are the properties liable? What other relief, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to?

This issue was decided against the defendants. It does not, however, appear that the question of the liability of these defendants after the death of Mahendra, was specifically brought to the notice of the Subordinate Judge. The ordering portion of the judgment was that a preliminary decree for rendition of accounts be passed in this case ex parte against defendant 1 and on contest against defendants 2 to 8. Then there was a certain direction as to costs. The plaintiff's contention is that these defendants might and ought to have appealed against this preliminary decree. Not having done so, they are precluded from disputing the correctness of the preliminary decree in an appeal preferred from the final decree under S. 97, Civil P. C. The learned vakil for the respondents, however, argued that there was no decree from which those defendants could appeal, because on the facts found accounts had to be taken in the presence of these defendants in order to find whether they were liable for any amount for which defendant 1 had not accounted during the lifetime of their father Mahendra Nath Roy. The question seems to me to have been left in obscurity on account of the perfunctory manner in which the judgment of the former Subordinate Judge was written and the decree drawn up. It appears, however, that this question as to the liability of defendants 2 to 8, after the death of their father, was fully argued before the second Subordinate Judge when he was hearing the case with regard to the final decree, and no objection was taken to that. He decided the point against the defendant's contention.

On appeal the very same point was allowed to be raised without objection before the District Judge who decided in favour of those defendants. Having regard to this circumstance I do not think it is open to us to say that this question ought not to have been allowed to be raised by these defendants after the preliminary decree had been passed. However, upon the finding that there was a contract to the contrary, as referred to in S. 131, Contract Act, that these defendants would be bound by the contract of suretyship entered into by their father Mahendra Nath Roy, for the period even after his death, this question becomes of no importance.

It is now necessary to find what the extent of liability of those defendants is. It has been contended on their behalf that they cannot under any circumstance, be made liable for anything in excess of Rs. 600, which can only be recovered by the sale of the property mortgaged in the surety bond by their father Mahendra Nath Roy. The learned vakil for the appellant rightly concedes that he cannot claim anything more.

The result, therefore, is that the judgment and decree of the District Judge, so far as defendants 2 to 8 are concerned must be set aside, and in lieu thereof a decree should be made modifying the decree of the Subordinate Judge to this effect : that if the plaintiff is unable to realize the amount decreed from defendant 1 he will be entitled to realize from the property mortgaged in the security bond dated the 27th March 1924, the amount due to the plaintiff not exceeding Rs. 600 by sale of the property. The costs of this appeal and those of the lower appellate Court will be in proportion to the success of each of the parties.

Criminal Revn. No. 1017 of 1927, Decided on 16th December 1927.

Calcutta Municipal Act (3 of 1923), S. 557 (a)—New procedure prescribed by Act 5 of 1926 is to be applied to proceedings in contravention of the old Act as well as the new Act.

By Act 5 of 1926 provision has been made whereby proceedings relating to a contravention of the provisions of the Calcutta Municipal Act, 1899, are to be taken in the manner prescribed by the Act of 1923 ; in other words, the new procedure is to be applied to contravention of the old Act as well as to contravention of the new Act.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case it would appear that it is alleged by the Corporation of Calcutta that the present applicant at his house No. 7, Bysack Street, had certain additions and alterations made without any necessary sanction being obtained from the Corporation in that behalf. It would seem that these additions and alterations were made at some time prior to 1923 and it would seem that after the new Municipal Act of 1923 came into force proceedings were taken to get a demolition order from a Magistrate in respect of the erections complained of. Those proceedings were apparently brought without taking the necessary preliminary steps prescribed by Ss. 363 and 364, Calcutta Municipal Act 1923 and it was pointed out at the time that even if those proceedings were regarded as proceedings under the old Act of 1899 they again were incurably defective by reasons that there had been no preliminary sanction given by the General Committee as required by the old Act. Accordingly those proceedings came to nothing and what has happened after that has been first of all that the legislature has passed Bengal Act 5 of 1926. That having been passed the present proceedings were really founded by a notice dated 22nd July 1927, calling upon the applicant to show cause why an order should not be made under S. 363 of the Act of 1923 directing that the work of all erections done at premises No. 7, Bysack Street, or so much of the same as has been unlawfully executed be demolished at your expense on the following among other grounds: additions and alterations without sanction.

That is a notice which was headed "S. 363, Act 3 (B. C.), 1923".

Now, it appears to me that if this matter has stood upon S. 363 of the Act of 1923 alone, it might very well be said that these erections having been completed before 1923 were not "alterations or additions" within the meaning of that particular S. 363 of the Act of 1923. But it has been drawn to our attention that by Act 5 of 1926 provision has been made whereby proceedings relating to a contravention of the provisions of the Calcutta Municipal Act, 1899 are to be taken in the manner prescribed by the Act of 1923; in other words, the new procedure is to be applied to contravention of the old Act as well as to contravention of the new Act. Accordingly this would be perfectly good order to make under S. 363 of the new Act although the breach of the regulation was committed under the old Act.

It has been suggested in argument by Mr. Taluqdar that the third clause of the new 557 (a) section, inserted in the Act of 1923 by the amending Act of 1926 does not have this effect. If one looks at the three clauses of that new section one finds therein that the first clause is to say that a proceeding which has been instituted under the old Act or which might have been instituted under the old Act may be continued or instituted by the Corporation as constituted under the new Act. That is the first clause. With reference to those provisions which require certain sanctions or preliminary procedure before legal proceedings can be validly started there is the second sub-section. The purpose of that is to say that the powers and duties of the General Committee and of the Chairman under the old scheme shall be deemed to have vested in the Corporation and the Chief Executive Officer respectively and that when any action has been taken in accordance with the old Act such action shall be deemed to have been taken by the corresponding authority under the new Act, and the corresponding provisions of the new Act shall be deemed to have been complied with. The third clause begins by saying: "Save as provided in sub-S. (2)." With that exception, namely the exception of the particular provisions already made with regard to those matters, it says that the procedure prescribed by this Act shall be followed in all proceedings relating to a contravention of the provisions of the Calcutta Municipal Act, 1899.

In my judgment the effect of that is this: there is no doubt that necessary sanction had been taken before these proceedings were instituted before a Magistrate. That being clear enough, sub-S (2) of the new section, having been complied with in that way, for the rest the new procedure is to be applied to a legal proceeding relating to a contravention of the old Act. That being so I am of opinion that the application to the Municipal Magistrate is quite in order.

It has been suggested that because the previous proceedings to obtain a demolition order came to nothing by reason that there was no sanction in the proper way no further application can be made by the Corporation to have these structures demolished. How the matter would have stood had the previous application been dealt with on the merits is another matter. But I am quite satisfied that the mere fact that proceedings have been held to be nugatory because they were not started after proper sanction cannot prevent new proceedings after sanction from being started to obtain a demolition order.

In this view the rule must be discharged.

H. S. Sukrawardy—for Petitioner.N. N. Sircar, Lingford James and C. C. Biswas—for Opposite Party.

Judgment.—This is an application under the Calcutta Municipal Act (3 of 1923 B. C.), for an order declaring the election of Mr. J. C. Dutt as Councillor for the Corporation for the Waterloo Street Constituency Ward No. 12 of the Corporation of Calcutta at the second Municipal General Election null and void. It is also prayed that one Mr. S. J. Cohen, the next candidate, be declared duly elected for the said ward.

The petitioner, Mr. A. B. Mitchell, is a gentleman whose name is enrolled in the electoral roll as a voter, and he disputes the validity of Mr. Dutt's election in the present proceedings which have been instituted under S. 46, Municipal Act. By this section any person enrolled in the electoral roll may apply to the High Court if there is any dispute as to whether any person whose name is published under sub-S. (8) of S. 29 is qualified to be elected a Councillor, or if the validity of any election is questioned, whether by reason of the commission of any corrupt practice by a candidate or his agent or by any other person or by reason of the improper rejection of a nomination or of the improper reception or refusal of a vote or for any other cause.

Section 47, to which I shall refer, later states the grounds on which the election of a returned candidate shall be void.

The facts, which are not disputed, are as follows:

The last date fixed for the filing of the nomination papers was 27th February 1927. As 27th February was a Sunday, the Chief Executive Officer of the Corporation published a notice in the "Statesman" (issue of 24th February) to the effect that 27th February being Sunday, the deposit money of the candidates, ordinarily due on 1st March under S. 27 (3) of the Act, would be received up to 5 p.m. of 2nd March. Mr. Dutt paid the deposit money on 2nd March. The scrutiny of the nominations was held on 3rd March. Mr. Dutt's nomination was accepted as a valid one, and he proceeded to election as a validly nominated candidate. The election for Ward No. 12 took place on 16th March and Mr. Dutt was declared by the Receiving Officer as the candidate who had been duly elected as Councillor for the Corporation for Ward No. 12. His election is now impugned on the ground that it proceeded upon a nomination that was void.

Section 27 (3) of the Act provides as follows :

A candidate who has been duly nominated shall within three days of his nomination deposit with the Executive Officer Rs. 250 Failure to deposit the said amount shall render the nomination void.

It is not disputed that under this section the deposit money was due on 1st March, and I have not understood counsel for Mr Dutt to contend that the Corporation had any authority to extend the time prescribed by the Act for paying the deposit money, but the answer made to the objection that Mr. Dutt's nomination was void, is that S. 27 (3) does not say that failure to deposit Rs. 250 within three days of the nomination shall render the nomination void. I think the section can mean nothing else, it is mandatory; and its plain sense is that within three days of the nomination the candidate must pay the deposit money, otherwise his nomination is rendered void. On the admitted facts it must be held that the nomination in this case was rendered void.

Then it is contended that, assuming the nomination was void, an objection to the validity of the election on that ground does not lie under S. 46 of the Act. It is argued that the scope of that section is confined to two general matters : the qualification of the elected candidate to be elected a Councillor and to the validity of the election on any of the grounds stated, and that the general words "or for any other cause" must be construed so as to admit only such other grounds as are ejusdem generis with those preceding these words. In support of the argument it is pointed out that inasmuch as only an improper rejection of a nomination is under the section made a ground for disputing the validity of an election, an 'improper acceptance of a nomination is by implication shut out from the section as a valid ground of objection. I am unable to construe the section in this way. I cannot agree that because the improper rejection of a nomination at the scrutiny, for any of the reasons contained in R. 15, is made a ground for disputing the election, the reasonable and correct inference to be drawn from the words of the section is that the improper acceptance of a nomination which had been rendered void is not an admissible ground for the purposes of S. 46.

On the subject of limiting general terms in a statute the Judicial Committee in the case of Attorney-General v. Merces (1) laid it down as a sound rule that every word ought prima facie to be construed 'in its primary and natural sense, unless a secondary or more limited sense is required by the subject or the context.

In the case of Smelting Co. of Australia v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (2) Rigby, L.J., on the same subject said :

The rule of construction which is called the ejusdem generis doctrine or sometimes noesetur socus is one, which, I think, ought to be applied with great caution because it implies a departure from the natural meaning of the words in order to give them a meaning which may or may not have been the intention of the legislature.

I may also refer to a short passage in the judgment of Esher, M. R., in Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Co. (3), which shows how far the rule of ejusdem generis should be carried, if it is applied:

That rule requires an interpretation of the general words limiting them to matters or things of the same kind as to the mischief being dealt with, as the previous words, but an interpretation as wide as the limitation just described will admit.

In the present case the ground of objection taken to the validity of the election is consistent with every word in S. 46, and I cannot see that any difficulty or complication can arise if this ground of objection is admitted under the general words as a proper one for the purposes of S. 46. In my opinion it would be pushing the principle of the rule of ejusdem generis too far not to do so.

Section 47 of the Act, referred to before, states the grounds on which the election of a returned candidate shall be void, and it provides that when the High Court is of opinion that the result of the election has been materially affected by any noncompliance with the provisions of the Act or the rules made thereunder, the election of the returned candidate shall be void. In this case, as stated before, by reason of the noncompliance with the provisions of S. 27(3) Mr. Dutt's nomination was rendered void, but it was acted upon at the scrutiny of nominations as a valid one—probably because the receiving officer proceeded upon the assumption that the Act had been complied with by virtue of the notice published by the Executive Officer in the "Statesman." Be that as it may, in the result Mr. Dutt was elected though he was not a duly nominated candidate. In my opinion, the objection to the election falls within the purview of S. 46, and the result of the election was materially affected by the noncompliance with the provisions of S. 27(3). The consequence of that non-compliance vitiated the election which I hold was null and void and which I set aside.

With regard to the contention that the next candidate should be declared elected I may say at once that I can find nothing in the Act to support it. It is urged that whereas S. 46 provides that a fresh election shall be held if the Court sets aside an election or holds it to be null and void, S. 47 merely provides that the election shall be void, and that it does not provide that a fresh election must be held. I must confess I am unable to appreciate the argument. S. 47 is not independent of S. 46 for it applies, in terms, to proceedings instituted under S. 46. It is clear from its scheme that S. 47 was intended to set out in Cl. (1) those cases in which an election shall be deemed void, and in Cl. (2) those cases in which discretion is given to the Court to find that an election is not void. There is no sensible distinction between the expressions "void" and "null and void" which are used indifferently in the two sections. I hold there is nothing in the Act to support the contention that the next candidate, Mr. Cohen, must be declared elected. In the result, though I must hold that Mr. Dutt's election was void, the prayer that Mr. Cohen be declared elected cannot be entertained.

Besides this petition of Mr. Mitchell, another petition was presented to this Court and a rule obtained on it by Mr. Prabodh Das who appeared and argued his petition in person. By agreement of all the parties both petitions were heard together. Mr. Das impugns the validity of Mr. Dutt's election on the same ground as that taken in Mr. Mitchell's petition, but he does not contend that the next candidate (Mr. Cohen) must be declared elected. As both these questions have been dealt with in my judgment I need not say anything further with regard to them.

Provincial Insolvency Act, S. 70—Court has discretion to satisfy itself in any way it thinks proper before ordering insolvent's prosecution.

Considering the history of S. 70, Provincial Insolvency Act, it would appear that the legislature intended that the Judge should satisfy himself in any way he thinks proper before ordering a prosecution of the insolvent; and this interpretation is justified by the omission from the amending Act of the direction which made it necessary for the Court to serve a notice on the debtor and hear him before ordering his prosecution: 20 Cal. 474, Foll.; 15 C. J. N. Majumdar and Ramesh Chandra Pal—for Respondents.

Suhrawardy, J.—This is an appeal against an order of the District Judge of 24-Parganas passed under S. 70, Provincial Insolvency Act, 1920, directing the prosecution of the appellant on making a complaint to a Magistrate of some offences mentioned in S. 69 of the Act. It appears that one of the creditors of the insolvent made an application before the District Judge complaining of certain fraudulent acts of the insolvent which were mentioned under seven heads in the petition. There was also a report from the Receiver in which it was complained that the insolvent had not disclosed all his properties. The learned Judge, presumably on the material before him held that he was satisfied that the insolvent had wilfully failed to perform the duties imposed on him by S. 22 of the Act by not producing his accounts and other books and by withholding documents relating to his affairs and that he had failed to disclose certain property to wit, two motor cars.

The appellant has appealed against the propriety of this order, having obtained special leave from this Court under S. 75, Provincial Insolvency Act. The point which has been pressed before us is that the District Judge ought to have held a preliminary enquiry before making a complaint under S. 70, and in the present case he did not give sufficient opportunity to the insolvent to prove that he had not committed the offences mentioned in the Judge's order. Great stress is laid on the words "after such preliminary enquiry, if any, as he thinks necessary" in S. 70 as it now stands. In order to understand what is meant by those words in the section it may be necessary to go back into the history of S. 70 of the Act. In the Act of 1907 S. 43 which dealt with offence in the course of insolvency proceedings, provided thus :

If a debtor, whether before or after the making of an order of adjudication wilfully makes false entries in the inventories, &c., the Court may sentence him, by order in writing, to simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year ; and in every such case the Court shall record the facts constituting the offence with the statement (if any) made by the debtor.

In practice the wording of the section was found to be vague and unworkable and it was, therefore, considered necessary to make it more explicit. S. 43 of the Act of 1907 was accordingly replaced by S. 70 of the Act of 1920. That section provided as follows :

Where the Court is satisfied that there is ground for enquiring into any offence referred to in S. 69 the Court shall direct that a notice be served on the debtor in the manner prescribed in the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898 for services of summons calling upon him to show cause why a charge or charges should not be framed against him.

The section further provided that the Insolvency Court might try the charge itself and convict the accused and sentence him to terms of imprisonment not exceeding three years. The last clause of S. 70 provided that the Court might instead of itself inquiring into an offence under S. 69 make a complaint thereof in writing to the nearest Magistrate of the First Class. S. 70 of the Act of 1920 therefore authorized the insolvency Court either to enquire into the offence itself and punish the accused or to send him to a Magistrate for trial. Then came the report of the Civil Justice Committee, 1924-25, which recommended that the procedure in this respect should be simplified and assimilated to that in England and recommendation was made in the following words :

We think, moreover, that the necessity for notice to the insolvent might well be discarded altogether and that the procedure in such cases might be further assimilated to the procedure in England whereby an order for prosecution should be obtained from the bankruptcy Court without consulting the bankrupt on the subject, the bankrupt having plenty of time and opportunity to say when he is arraigned before the criminal Court.

Attempt was made to give effect to this recommendation and S. 70 of the Act of 1920 was amended by Act 9 of 1926. By that Act the first three clauses of S. 70 of the Act of 1920 were repealed and following clauses substituted :

Where the Court is satisfied, after such preliminary enquiry, if any, as it thinks necessary, that there is ground for enquiring into any offence referred to in S. 69 and appearing to have been committed by the insolvent, the Court may record a finding to that effect and make a complaint of the offence in writing to a Magistrate of the First Class having jurisdiction, and such Magistrate shall deal with such complaint in the manner laid down in the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898.

The effect of this amendment to take away the power from the insolvency Court of itself trying the insolvent and sentencing him to punishment, and also to dispense with the necessity of serving notice on the debtor setting forth the substance of the offence and of hearing him in answer. In place of the latter provision in the Act of 1920 it was enacted that the insolvency Court might hold a preliminary inquiry, if any, before ordering the prosecution of the insolvent. It is not necessary for our present purpose but I may mention that the amendment made in 1926 was so clumsily done that the last two Cls. (4 and 5), of S. 70 and the last sentence in S. 69 of the Act of 1920 were left undisturbed. These clauses, by amendment made in 1926, had become redundant and meaningless. This omission was subsequently discovered and Acts 10 and 12 of 1927 were passed with certain repealed words in the amending Act 9 of 1926 in S. 69 of the Act of 1920 the effect of which is that S. 70 stands as it was enacted by the Act of 1926 minus Cls. (4) and (5) of S. 70 of the Act of 1920. The amendment made in 1927 does not affect this case as the order of the learned District Judge was passed before the Act of 1927 came into force the order being dated 2nd February 1927.

Now we have to consider the meaning of the words "after such preliminary enquiry, if any, as it thinks necessary" that have been introduced into the section by the Act of 1926. If the plain and natural meaning is given to these words they make it discretionary with the Judge; (1) to hold a preliminary enquiry; and (2) if it holds one, to have it of such a nature as it thinks necessary. In other words the Judge may or may not hold a preliminary enquiry and, if he decides to hold one, he may make such enquiry as he thinks necessary in order to satisfy himself that there is ground for enquiring into the offences referred to in S. 69. That seems to be the ordinary sense in which the words have been used leaving it entirely to the discretion of the Judge to determine how he will be satisfied before ordering the prosecution of the insolvent. But reference has been made to S. 476, Criminal P. C., 1898, where those very words are used in connexion with the procedure in case of complaints by Courts of Justice. In interpreting those words in the section the Courts have held that they make it entirely discretionary with the Court to order inquiry; but in some cases the superior Courts have interfered with the order of the inferior Court on the ground that the case is such in which preliminary enquiry ought to have been made. There are considerations which do not depend upon any interpretation of the statute but upon the facts of each particular case. For myself I prefer to adopt the dictum of Pigot, J. in the case Baperam Surma v Gouri Nath Dutt (1):

Although it may sometimes well be that a preliminary inquiry ought to be held, the adoption of a rigid rule to that effect would simply introduce into the criminal procedure in this country a new stage as a matter of imperative necessity. . . . We do not think that such a practice is rendered imperative by the law, and it is not desirable that it should be necessarily, and in every case, introduced.

In the case of Durpa Narayan Bera v. Bepin Behary Mitter (2) it has been held that the holding of a preliminary enquiry in a proceeding under S. 476, Criminal P. C., is discretionary and a person against whom an order for prosecution has been passed without such an enquiry cannot complain. Then the learned Judges add, "unless he has been prejudiced by the omission" This qualification might have been considered necessary in that case; but there is nothing in the law to support the view that the discretion of the Judge is in any way restricted or saddled with any qualification by the law. It is not always safe to interpret one statute with reference to another statute dealing with a different subject; but as S. 70, Provincial Insolvency Act and S. 476, Criminal P. C., deal with offences, though of different nature, it might be taken that in introducing the words in S. 70 the legislature had S. 476, Criminal P. C., in view. Considering the history of S. 70, Provincial Insolvency Act, as I have attempted to detail above, it would appear that the legislature intended that the Judge should satisfy himself in any way he thinks proper before ordering a prosecution; and this interpretation is justified by the omission from the amending Act of the direction which made it necessary for the Court to serve a notice on the debtor and hear him before ordering his prosecution. As the section now stands the Court may pass an order under S. 70 ex parte and in the absence of the insolvent. This being the law the District Judge has not acted in contravention of any provision of the law. The question that remains for consideration is whether in the circumstances of the present case he has exercised his judicial discretion properly or whether he should have given the insolvent an opportunity of satisfying him that there was no ground for ordering his prosecution. It appears that the creditor filed a statement formulating the charges and the nature of the evidence he sought to produce. The insolvent's pleader was informed of that fact and he took time to look into the charges. A week after the learned Judge heard the pleader for the insolvent and also the creditor and on the following day held that he was satisfied that the insolvent had committed the offences under the Act.

Section 70 of the Act of 1920, as I have observed, was amended by removing from it the procedure under which the District Judge could himself try and convict the insolvent as it was found in practice that it entailed waste of time of the insolvency Court and as it was found undesirable that the Court dealing with insolvency proceedings should itself try the offence in regard to which it might reasonably be held to have formed an opinion prejudicial to the alleged offender.

(2) [1911] 14 C. L. J. 123=10 I. C. 66=15 C. W. N. 691.

If we adopt the view that has been pressed before us, namely, that the District Judge ought to hold a preliminary enquiry by which is suggested a judicial enquiry giving opportunity to both sides to adduce evidence and fight the matter out before him the object of the amendment would be entirely lost. In that case there should be two enquiries: one before the Judge and another before the Magistrate to whom the case might be sent. I am not prepared to hold that in the present case the learned Judge has not exercised his judicial discretion properly in ordering the prosecution of the insolvent. But it is argued that the learned Judge ought not to have relied upon the report of the receiver and upon the petition filed by the creditor. We do not know if the learned Judge merely relied upon the allegation made by the creditor. But it seems to me that he was within his rights in attaching importance to the report of the receiver, his own officer. There is no question whether the report of the receiver is admissible in evidence according to the Evidence Act; it is the report of an officer of the Court bringing certain facts to its notice; and the Court, after perusing the report, may in its discretion call for proof of the facts alleged or act upon the report. The fact that the learned Judge out of the seven charges made by the creditor, picked out two for consideration shows that he gave proper consideration to the case after hearing the insolvent's pleader and has come to a conclusion which cannot be said on the materials before him to be wrong. I will, therefore, dismiss the appeal with costs four gold mohurs to come out of the estate of the insolvent.

Graham, J.—The facts shortly are that the appellant, Jewraj, applied on 27th June 1927 to be adjudged an insolvent and a receiver was appointed. In the case of the proceedings which followed, it transpired, or at all events it is alleged, that the insolvent had wilfully failed to perform some of the duties imposed on him by S. 22, Provincial Insolvency Act, by not producing his account books and other books and by withholding documents relating to his affairs; and further that he had failed to disclose certain property, to wit, two motor-cars. A report was called from the receiver and on the basis thereof and on hearing the pleaders on both sides the learned Judge ordered the prosecution of the insolvent under S. 69 of the Act and directed to issue a letter of complaint to the Magistrate as provided for in S. 70 of the Act. The main ground on which the orders are assailed is that they have been passed upon insufficient materials and that the learned Judge should, before making the orders, have held a judicial enquiry, it being contended that the words "preliminary enquiry;" in S. 70 mean a judicial inquiry, that is to say, upon sworn evidence. In my judgment this contention is without substance. S. 70, as it now it stands, after the amendment effected by the repealing Act (10 of 1927), reads as follows:

Where the Court is satisfied, after such preliminary enquiry, if any, as it thinks necessary, that there is ground for such enquiry into an offence referred to in S. 69, and appearing to have been committed by the insolvent, the Court may record a finding to that effect and make a complaint of the offence in writing to a Magistrate of the First Class having jurisdiction and such Magistrate shall deal with such complaint in the manner laid down in the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898.

It is clear that the Court has the discretion to make a preliminary enquiry or not as it thinks fit. It is not bound to do so. Speaking myself I do not think that upon the facts of the present case we should be justified in interfering with the discretion which has been exercised by the learned District Judge. It seems to me further to be open to some doubt whether the words "preliminary enquiry" in S. 70 of the Act necessarily mean a judicial enquiry on sworn evidence. We have not been shown any authority in support of this proposition. It is to be born in mind that in the insolvency proceedings the report of the receiver is often acted upon by the Court and I see no reason why the learned District Judge, acting as he did upon the report of the receiver and after hearing the pleaders on both sides, should not be held to have sufficiently complied with the requirements of the section. It is to be observed that what the section requires is that the Court should be satisfied that there is ground for enquiry. What seems to be contemplated is that the enquiry should be made, if necessary, before the Magistrate instead of taking up the time of the District Judge whose time ought not to be wasted over such matters. The Magistrate has to deal with the complaint in the manner laid down in the Criminal Procedure Code and it by no means follows that he will necessarily issue process on the complaint without making a preliminary enquiry or directing investigation as he is empowered to do under S. 202, Criminal P. C. I agree, therefore, with my learned brother that the appeal fails and should be dismissed. Civil Rule 408 (m) of 1927 is discharged.

Appeal from Original Order No. 379 of 1926, Decided on 15th August 1927.

Civil P. C., O. 1, R. 10—Appellant becoming insolvent—Official Assignee not proceeding with appeal—Party claiming to be entitled to the property of appellant under mortgage applying for substitution—Substitution cannot be allowed.

During the pendency of the appeal from an order of dismissal of an application for setting aside the sale the appellant judgment-debtor was adjudicated a bankrupt. Thereupon, the Official Assignee elected not to proceed with the appeal. A petition was presented by a party who claimed to be entitled to the property in dispute under a mortgage executed in his favour by the judgment-debtor. Throughout the whole of these proceedings the claimant took no steps to vindicate his rights. He sought for an order that he might be added or substituted for the insolvent or the Official Assignee as appellant in the appeal.

Held: that such an application was misconceived, and the petitioner was not entitled to the order which he claimed having elected not to enforce whatever rights he had. [P 215 C 2]

Page, J.—This is an application by the respondents in an appeal that the appeal be dismissed as against them and for incidental relief. The respondents are the auction-purchaser and the decree-holder. The decree was obtained against the person who presented the appeal in the suit. In execution of that decree the property in dispute was sold at an auction sale. After the sale, the judgment-debtor applied to set aside the sale under O. 21, R. 90. That application was dismissed. From that application an appeal was preferred to the High Court. During the pendency of the appeal the judgment-debtor was adjudicated a bankrupt. Thereupon the Official Assignee elected not to proceed with the appeal. Hence the present application. Now, the judgment-debtor having been adjudicated an insolvent pending the appeal ceased to have any interest in the matter, and his assets passed to the Official Assignee. The Official Assignee having elected not to proceed with the appeal the respondents are entitled to have the appeal dismissed.

A petition has been presented by a party who claims to be entitled to the property in dispute under a mortgage executed in his favour by the judgment-debtor in 1922. Throughout the whole of these proceedings until the present application was filed, this claimant has taken no steps to vindicate his rights. He now seeks for an order that he may be added or substituted for the insolvent or the Official Assignee as appellant in the present appeal. In my opinion, such an application is misconceived, and the petitioner is not entitled to the order which he claims. Whatever rights he has or may have had, he has elected not to enforce. He is at liberty, of course, to take such steps as may now be open to him to vindicate his rights. But after the adjudication and after the refusal of the Official Assignee to prosecute the appeal, in my opinion, he is entitled to proceed with the appeal. The result is that the appeal will stand dismissed with costs, the costs of and incidental to the appeal to be a claim against the estate of the insolvent. The petition is dismissed with costs. The hearing-fee in respect of the appeal is assessed at two gold mohurs for each respondent, and the hearing-fee of the petition on behalf of the Karnani Industrial Bank, Ltd. is two gold mohurs in favour of each of the opposite parties. The unspent balance of the paper-book costs, deposited by the respondents, should be refunded to them.

Appeal No 489 of 1925, Decided on 28th July 1927, from appellate decree of 2nd Addl. Dist. Judge., Dacca, D/- 7th November 1924.

(a) Cosharer—Possession by a cosharer of common land in excess of his share without objection from other cosharers—He is not bound to pay profits accrued from the same.

Where one cosharer is in separate possession of the common land (whether or not the portion of the land which he is occupying is in excess of the area that would fall to him upon partition) without objection from or ouster or exclusion of the other cosharers, he is under no obligation either to account or to pay compensation to such cosharers in respect of the profits which have accrued to him by reason of the skill or industry which he has employed in making good use of the property while he was in possession : Henderson v. Eason: (1852) 17 Q. B. 701, Foll.: 18 Cal. 10 (P. C.); 23 Cal. 799; and A. I. R. 1924 P. C. 144, Dist. [P 216 C 2 P 217 C 1]

(b) Cosharer — Terms “exclusion” and “ouster” explained—Physical possession is not necessary for proving an ouster.

To exclude is to “keep out,”; to oust is to “put out,” of possession. But it is not essential to prove physical dispossession in order to establish an ouster. For ouster and exclusion may be actual or constructive, and whenever a cotenant remains in separate occupation in defiance of a claim to joint possession asserted by his cosharers, and thus prevents them from obtaining possession, he is deemed to have excluded or ousted his cosharers. Separate occupation by one cosharer, therefore, is not necessarily exclusive occupation; it may or may not be, according to the circumstances that are proved, and each case will turn upon its own facts. [P 217 C 2]

Page, J.—This is a suit brought by cosharers against another cosharer of immovable property to recover compensation for occupation by the defendant of more than his share in the land of which all the cosharers are tenants-in-common. The appeal depends upon an issue of fact, for, when that issue has been decided, the Court will be enabled to determine whether this particular case falls within the ambit of decisions such as Robert Watson and Co. Ltd. v. Ram Chand Dutt (1), Robert Watson and Co. v. Ram Chand (2), Midnapur Zamindari Co. Ltd v. Nares Narain Roy (3), or within the principles laid down in Lachmeswar Singh v. Manowar Hussain (4), Mohes Narain v. Nowbutt Pathak (5), Debendra Narayan Singha v. Narendranarayan (6). Now, it has been found or admitted that the defendant was in possession of land in excess of the share that he would receive on partition; that the plaintiffs have never sought joint occupation of the land; and that no objection has been raised by the plaintiffs to the occupation of the land by the defendant. The defendant has not claimed any exclusive right of possession, or any title by adverse possession as against the plaintiffs. In the circumstances it cannot be pretended that the defendant has been in occupation of this land after excluding or ousting the plaintiffs from their right to joint possession thereof with him. Nevertheless, the plaintiffs claim that, inasmuch as the defendant admittedly is receiving profits by reason of his occupation of the land, he is bound to account to the other cosharers for such portion of the profits arising from his separate occupation as the Court deems to be fit compensation to them for not being in actual joint possession of the land. Now, where cosharers are entitled to joint possession of immovable property as tenants-in-common each of such cosharers is entitled to be in possession of each and every part of the common land. But, for the purpose of the profitable occupation of the joint property, it usually happens that some of the cosharers are found to be in occupation of some portions of the land, and other cosharers of other portions; and it is, I think, clearly established, that where one cosharer is in separate possession of the common land (whether or not the portion of the land which he is occupying is in excess of the area that would fall to him upon partition) without objection from, or ouster or exclusion of the other cosharers, he is under no obligation either to account or to pay compensation to such cosharers in respect of the profits which have accrued to him by reason of the skill or industry which he has employed in making good use of the property while he was in possession. If the law were otherwise it would put a premium upon sloth, and all that a cosharer need do would be to allow an industrious cosharer to spend time, money, and energy upon the land of which they are tenants-in-common, and having lain by until the fruits of his industrious cosharer have been gathered to claim a share of the profits for the accrual of which he can claim no credit, and which in no way are due to any skill or labour on his part. Upon what principle of fairness or commonsense is such a co-sharer entitled to claim compensation from the cosharer in occupation? I can think of none. And I am fortified in this view when I look at the other side of the picture. Suppose an industrious cosharer, while in separate occupation of the common land with the consent, express or tacit of the other cosharers, suffers a reversal of fortune, and, notwithstanding all his efforts, a loss accrues to him as the outcome of his occupation; can he claim from his cosharers a proportionate contribution towards the loss that he has suffered? Clearly not. On the other hand, if a cosharer, notwithstanding an objection from the other co-sharers, claims an exclusive right to occupy a portion of the land of which they have a common right to possession, or excludes or ousts from possession the other cosharers, it is equally clear, in my opinion, that he will have to pay compensation to the other cosharers for any profits that they may be held to have lost by reason of his exclusive occupation of the common land. In Henderson v. Eason (7) Parke, B., laid down that if one tenant-in-common occupied, and took the whole profits, the other had no remedy against him while the tenancy-in-common continued unless he was put out of possession when he might have his ejectment, or unless he appointed the other to be his bailiff as to his undivided moiety, and the other accepted that appointment, when an action of account would lie, as against a bailiff of the owner of the entirety of an estate.

His Lordship further observed that there are obviously many cases in which a tenant-in-common may occupy and enjoy the land or other subject of tenancy-in-common solely, and have all the advantage to be derived from it, and yet it would be most unjust to make him pay anything. For instance, if a dwelling house, or barn, or room, is solely occupied by one tenant-in-common, without ousting the other, nothing is received; and it would be most inequitable to hold that he thereby, by the simple act of occupation or use, without any agreement, should be liable to pay a rent or anything in the nature of compensation, to his cotenants for that occupation or use to which to the full extent to which he enjoyed it he had a perfect right . . .

Parke, B., also stated that there are many cases where profits are made, and are actually taken by one cotenant, and yet it is impossible to say that he has received more than comes to his just share. For instance, one tenant employs his capital and industry in cultivating the whole of a piece of land, the subject of the tenancy, in a mode in which the money and labour expended greatly exceed the value of the rent or compensation for the mere occupation of the land; in raising hops, for example, which is a very hazardous adventure. He takes the whole of the crops and is he to be accountable for any of the profits in such a case, when it is clear that, if the speculation had been a losing one altogether, he could not have called for a moiety of the losses, as he would have been enabled to do had it been so cultivated by the mutual agreement of the cotenants.

It is necessary, however, to appreciate the meaning of the terms "exclusion" and "ouster" in this connexion. To exclude is to "keep out," to oust is to "put out," of possession. But it is not essential to prove physical dispossession in order to establish an ouster. For ouster and exclusion may be actual or constructive, and whenever a cotenant remains in separate occupation in defiance of a claim to joint possession asserted by his cosharers, and thus prevents them from obtaining possession, he is deemed to have excluded or ousted his cosharers. Separate occupation by one cosharer, therefore, is not necessarily exclusive occupation; it may, or may not, be, according to the circumstances that are proved, and each case will turn upon its own facts. In Watson & Co. v. Ram Chand Dutt (1) & (2), Midnapur Zemindary Co. Ltd. v. Nares Narain Roy (3), a cosharer who claimed a right to compensation or mesne profits was held to be entitled to a decree because the defendant cosharers had excluded or ousted him from possession, or had challenged his title to joint possession of the land of which they were tenants-in-common. The learned vakil for the respondents placed much reliance upon the following passage in the judgment of the Privy Council in the Midnapur Zemindary Co. v. Nares Narain Roy (3):

Where lands in India are so held in common by cosharers each cosharer is entitled to cultivate in his own interests, in a proper and husband-like manner, any part of the lands which is not being cultivated by another of his cosharers, but he is liable to pay to his cosharers compensation in respect of such exclusive use of the lands. Such an exclusive use of lands held in common by a cosharer is not an ouster of his cosharers from their proprietary right as cosharers in the lands.

But when the facts of that case are ascertained it is found that for many years the Midnapur Zemindary Co. or their predecessors-in-title have repudiated the title of the plaintiffs cosharers to joint possession of the land in dispute, and in that suit had resisted the plaintiff's claim and had challenged the plaintiffs' title, both upon the ground of adverse possession, and also because they had purchased in execution of a decree a jote which they themselves had granted in respect of a part of the land of which they were entitled to joint possession with the plaintiffs. The passage to which we have been referred must be read in connexion with the facts of that particular case, and, in my opinion, is not to be taken as in any way conflicting with the principles of law that we have endeavoured to restate. When these principles are applied to the facts of the present case the solution of the problem presents no difficulty, for the plaintiffs have not asserted a claim to joint occupation of the land in dispute; they have not objected to the defendant being in occupation of such land; and they have neither been excluded nor ousted from possession of the land by the defendant. What they claim is a share of the profits which have resulted from the defendant's occupation of the land. In the circumstances obtaining in this case it is, in my opinion, clear that the plaintiffs' claim is misconceived, and, if they are not content with the manner in which the cosharers are enjoying and occupying the land of which they all are entitled to possession as tenants-in-common, their remedy is to proceed by way of partition.

The result is that the appeal is allowed.

Usha Kanta Guha—for Respondents.

Panton, J.—This appeal arises from an application made to the Munsif under S. 7, Ben. Ten. Act, which resulted in an ex-parte order. He found, on the evidence before him, that the gross collection from the tenure was 8 aras and 6 kuris odd of paddy and Rs 32-9-0 in money rent. He valued the paddy at an agreed rate which brought the total gross collection to Rs. 130 after deducting one-third from the value of the paddy for what he called "uncertainties in the value of the paddy and for other uncertain elements." He left to the defendant 50 per cent. of profits and thus fixed the rent of the tenure at Rs. 65. From this decision both parties appealed to the Subordinate Judge of Midnapur. For the tenure-holder it was contended that the learned Munsif should not have heard the case ex-parte. The learned Subordinate Judge's finding on this point was that the defendants had had enough indulgence and that they could not complain that they did not get more. The second contention for the tenure-holder was that the learned Munsif did not come to any finding as to the existence of a customary rate. The learned Subordinate Judge found that, while there was no express finding on this point, yet there was evidence on the record that there was no such customary rate existing. It is the third contention of the tenure-holder which found favour with the learned Subordinate Judge. This was that the learned Munsif should not have made the value of the produce rent the basis of his calculation, but should have ascertained and substituted for it a fair and equitable cash rent. The learned Subordinate Judge was of opinion that the principle involved in Sub-S. 4, S. 7, should have been applied to so much of the land as paid the produce rent, because, at any future date on which proceedings might be taken under S. 40, Ben. Ten. Act, equilibrium might be disturbed by the settlement of cash rent under that section. For this reason he remanded the case to the Munsif for a fresh trial. The appeal of the landlord was apparently not seriously pressed before the learned Subordinate Judge. The landlord has appealed against this order of remand.

It is contended on behalf of the respondents, in the first place that, no appeal lies. It is said that the order of remand was not one under O. 41, R. 23, but was one under S. 151, Civil P. C. and, therefore, it is urged, there is no second appeal. In this respect reliance is placed upon a decision of this Court in Mohendra Nath Chakravarti v. Ramtaran Bandopadhyaya (1). For the appellant it is contended that in form and in substance this was an order under O. 41, R. 23, and that consequently, on the authority of Basumati Debi v. Tarubasini Dasi (2), which was followed in Prosanna Chandra v. Baidya Nath Mistri (3), there is a second appeal. But we are satisfied that in the present instance the order complained of was not in form or in substance one under O. 41, R. 23, and these decisions have, therefore, no application. On the other hand reference is made to a decision of this Court in Bhairab Chandra Dutt v. Kali Kumar Dutt (4). It would appear, at first sight, that this later decision is in conflict with that in Mahendra Nath v. Ramtaran Bhattacharjee (1), to which I have just referred. In the earlier decision, however, the case was not considered upon the footing of the remand being one under S. 151, and it was upon this footing that this Court in the later decision held that there was a second appeal. It seems to us plain that the remand here cannot possibly fall under either of the rules contained in O. 41, but was made under S. 151. The result in our opinion is that an appeal does lie to this Court.

Turning then to the merits of the appeal: it is impossible for a Court acting under S. 7, Ben. Ten. Act, to arrive with absolute accuracy at a rate of rent. The best that the Court can do is to make an approximation to what the rent of a tenure should justly be. It is possible that the more refined method which the learned Subordinate Judge directed to be applied might result in a somewhat closer approximation to what the rent to be fixed under S. 7 should be though it is impossible to foresee what result might ensue from the application in the present case; that is, whether it would increase or decrease the rent as fixed by the Munsif. It is, however, necessary to point out that there is latent, in the learned Subordinate Judge's method, the same defect, though possibly in a less degree, as in that of the learned Munsif. For it does not follow that a fair and equitable rent, such as is spoken of in Sub-S. 4, S. 7, will be the same as the money-rent which may, at some future date, be fixed under S. 40. Bearing this in view, it seems to us that a remand on this ground was neither necessary nor desirable, and that a possible increase in accuracy is quite incommensurate with the expense to which the parties would be put by a further investigation of the matter. In this view we are unable to support the order made by the learned Subordinate Judge. In the ordinary course of events we would remit this case to the learned Subordinate Judge in order that he might rehear the appeal. In the circumstances, however, we do not think that this course is in the interest of either party. The facts are now before us and we think that it is possible for us finally to decide the question between them. As I have pointed out, the first two objections taken by the tenure-holder to the result arrived at by the learned Munsif did not find favour with the learned Subordinate Judge and in this respect we agree with his view. The only point which remains, therefore, is this matter of the produce rent of a part of the land. In this respect we have little fault to find with the result at which the learned Munsif had arrived and we are of opinion that the rent of the tenure which he has fixed is just and equitable and that the proper course for us to take is to set aside the order of the learned Subordinate Judge and to restore the order of the Munsif. This we accordingly do.

The parties will bear their own costs in all Courts.

The defendant pleaded that the areas of the holdings and the rents were not correctly described. The plaintiff accepted the defendants' statement as the amount of the jama and the suits were decreed by the first Court accordingly. The defendants appealed to the District Judge on the ground that the plaintiff should not have been allowed to amend her plaint and that the suits ought to have been dismissed. The learned Judge, while dismissing the appeals, gave effect to a plea not taken in the grounds of appeal before him or raised in the first Court, viz., that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the rent claimed under S. 16, Ben. Ten. Act as she had not observed the procedure as laid down under S. 15, of the Act. The learned Judge, in dismissing the defendants' appeal, added a rider that the plaintiff must get herself recognized by the landlord within a month, on failure of which her suits would stand dismissed.

The plaintiff has appealed and has also filed petitions in revision in case no appeal lay from the decree of the lower appellate Court. The respondents have taken a preliminary objection that the appeals are incompetent inasmuch as no appeals lay to the District Judge from the decrees of the Munsif who was specially authorized to try rent suits under S. 153, Ben. Ten. Act. This objection applies to appeals Nos. 667 and 669 of 1921 which are valued at less than Rs. 50. The objection is valid, but the appellant relies on the authority of the case of Kalipada Karmakar v. Sekhar Bashini (1), and maintains that the appeals in this Court were competent. It is not necessary to examine this question as the appellants have also presented petitions in our revisional jurisdiction in the exercise of which we may set the matter right. We accordingly hold that the decrees passed by the lower appellate Court must be vacated and those of the first Court restored.

With regard to Appeal No. 668 of 1921 valued at over Rs. 50: an appeal lay to the Court of appeal and we have to examine the correctness of the decision of that Court. Now the learned Judge admits that the point that the plaintiff is not competent to maintain the suit under S. 16, Ben. Ten. Act, was not raised in the first Court nor taken as a ground in the memorandum of appeal before him. It is a matter for regret that in such circumstances the learned Judge should have thought it proper to investigate the question the correct determination of which might depend upon evidence, for I find that one of the grounds taken before us in appeal is that it should have been held that the rent receipts produced by the plaintiff from her landlord furnished legal proof of her recognition. It is possible that the plaintiff could have adduced more evidence in support of the recognition if the objection were taken in time. But since the Judge has considered that question as a pure question of law and come to a decision, I propose to examine the correctness of it as a question of law.

Chapter 3, Ben. Ten. Act, makes a well-marked distinction between a transfer of a tenure and succession to it. In the former case, whether the transfer is voluntary or involuntary, the provisions of Ss. 12 and 13 must be complied with. In the case of succession by which is meant succession to the interest by inheritance or any mode of devolution other than transfer, the requirements of S. 15 should be observed before the successor can maintain a suit for rent.

Now in this case the plaintiff is a transferee from the heirs of the panidar, who (the heirs) had not got their names registered with the landlord in terms of S. 15, Ben. Ten. Act. As a transferee S. 15 is not applicable in her case: she might be governed by Ss. 12 and 13; but, as it is a patni tenure, those sections do not apply in her case: Gyanada v. Brahmamoye (2). The question then arises that her vendors who had succeeded to the tenure not having complied with S. 15 before transferring the tenure, is the plaintiff debarred by the provisions of S. 16 from recovering rent from the defendant, for Ss. 15 and 16, Ben. Ten. Act, have been held to be applicable to patni tenures? Durga v. Brindaban (3). These sections, being penal in effect, ought to be strictly construed: William Shariff v. Jogmaya (4), and Masbahuddin v. Abdul Burkat (5). No doubt plaintiff's vendors could not have recovered rent accruing due during the period of their possession and apparently they would not vest their transferee with a right they did not possess; but, in order to attract the bar created by S. 16, two conditions must co-exist: the plaintiff must have succeeded to the tenure and the rent sued for must be payable to him as the holder of the tenure. In the present case the first condition does not apply to the plaintiff, and it follows that she is not precluded by the provisions of S. 16 from maintaining the present suit. To hold otherwise would lead to an absurdity which presumably was not in the contemplation of the legislature. If, as in the present case, one of the intermediate holders of the tenure who has succeeded to it fails to comply with the provisions of S. 15 and his transferee is, therefore, incompetent to maintain a suit for recovery of rent, the transferee from such transferee and all subsequent transferees will be similarly debarred with the result that the tenants will occupy the lands rent free for ever. As I have said the section must be strictly construed and I am not prepared to extend its operation beyond its strict terms. I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to a decree in this case and the learned Judge has acted illegally and without jurisdiction in qualifying that decree in the way he has done. Even though an appeal may not lie to this Court under S. 153, Ben. Ten. Act, we may interfere with the decree of the lower appellate Court under S. 115, Civil P. C. The result is that the decree of the lower Court of appeal is set aside and that of the Munsif restored.

The appeals are, therefore, dismissed but without costs. The rules are made absolute in the terms indicated above. The plaintiff is entitled to recover her costs in the Rules, only one hearing-fee of two gold mohurs being allowed and that in R. 99 S of 1921. In the other two Rules no vakil's fee is allowed, but the plaintiff will be entitled to realize the other costs incurred by her.

Provincial Insolvency Act (1920)—Act is not retrospective—Applications by debtor before its passing are to be dealt with under the old Act of 1907.

The provisions of the new Act, which have substantially altered the pre-existing law cannot be given retrospective operation so as to take away the right enjoyed by the debtor under the Act of 1907, if the latter was in force when the application was made: *Colonial Sugar Refining Co. v. Judgment.—This appeal is directed against an order of dismissal of an application made by a debtor to be adjudicated an insolvent. The application was presented on 18th September 1919 when the provisions of the Provincial Insolvency Act of 1907 were in force. The presentation of the application is an act of insolvency under S. 4, Cl. (F), which provides that a debtor commits an act of insolvency if he petitions to be adjudged an insolvent under the provisions of that statute. The petition complied with the requirements of S. 6, sub-Cl. (3), which ordains that a debtor shall not be entitled to present an insolvency petition unless his debts amount to Rs. 500. The debtor stated that the total amount of money claimed against him was Rs. 1,269. The application was registered and notice was directed to be issued to the creditors through registered posts. The 14th November 1919 was the date fixed for hearing. On that date, one Sarat Chandra Chaudhury and fifteen others put in a petition of objection in which they stated that the debts of the petitioners amounted to Rs. 1,985. There can be no question that in these circumstances an order for adjudication should have been made as a matter of course. The case, however, was adjourned from time to time till 4th September 1920, when it was taken up for disposal. Meanwhile, the Provincial Insolvency Act, 1920 had received the assent of the Governor-General in Council on 25th February 1920 and had come into operation. A question was raised before the District Judge whether the matter should be determined on the basis of the provisions of the Insolvency Act, 1907 or the Insolvency Act, 1920. The District Judge held that the provisions of the new Act were applicable. He investigated the case on the merits and held that the application was not bona fide. In this view he dismissed the application.

We are of opinion that the District Judge was clearly in error when he dealt with the application under the provisions of the new Act. The nature of the right enjoyed by the debtor under the Provincial Insolvency Act, 1907 was considered by the Judicial Committee in the case of Chhatrapat Singh v. Kharag Singh (1), Sir Lawrence Jenkins pointed out that

If the conditions prescribed by the Act are satisfied, the Act entitles a debtor to an order of adjudication. This does not depend on the Court's discretion, but it is a statutory right, and a debtor who brings himself properly within the terms of the Act is not to be deprived of that right on so treacherous a ground of decision as an abuse of the process of the Court.

We are unable to hold that the provisions of the new Act, which have substantially altered the pre-existing law, could be given retrospective operation so as to take away the right enjoyed by the debtor under the Act of 1907 which was in force when the application was made: Colonial Sugar Refining Co. v. Irvine (2). The view we take is in accord with that adopted in P. Hanmayya v. Ramayya (3).

The result is that this appeal is allowed and the order of the District Judge discharged. We make the order which should have been made by him, namely, the order of adjudication.

We direct that the records be sent down to the District Judge so that he may take steps to give effect to our order.

Page, J.—The determination of this appeal depends upon the true construction of O. 21, R. 29, Civil P. C. The question raised is one of first impression, for in none of the High Courts in India does it appear to have been considered or decided. O. 21, R. 29 runs as follows :

Where a suit is pending in any Court against the holder of a decree of such Court, on the part of the person against whom the decree was passed, the Court may, on such terms as to security or otherwise, as it thinks fit, stay execution of the decree until the pending suit has been decided.

The question to be determined is whether the words “until the pending suit has been decided” mean until a decree has been passed by the Court in which the suit is pending, or until the claim in the pending suit has finally been determined. The material facts are not in dispute.

The present appellants or their predecessors-in-title obtained a decree in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Asansole against the respondent for Rs. 10,939-14-0 and costs on the 22nd March 1915. This decree was affirmed on appeal to the High Court on 14th January 1918. On the 18th April 1925 the appellants applied to the Subordinate Judge of Asansole for execution of the decree which they had obtained in the High Court on 14th January 1918 to the extent to which it had not already been satisfied. On the 29th August 1925, the learned Subordinate Judge of Asansole dismissed the appellants' application upon the ground that it was barred by limitation. Against this order the appellant decree-holders have preferred the present appeal. The appeal is supported upon two grounds : (1) that the present application for execution must be treated as a continuation of a previous execution case (No. 101 of 1919) ; (ii) that an order under O. 21, R. 29 staying the execution of the decree of 14th January 1918 had been passed by the learned Subordinate

Judge of Asansole on the 14th April 1920 ; that the stay order remained in force until the 24th November 1924 ; and that, if the time during which the execution of the appellants' decree was stayed was excluded from the period during which limitation would run, the application for execution of the 18th April 1925 was not time barred.

Now, it appears that in the execution case No. 101 of 1919 (31st July 1919) Rs. 7,844-4-0 were realized in part satisfaction of the decree, and this case was dismissed on part satisfaction on 30th April 1920. On the 19th May 1920 the appellants again applied for execution of the decree in Case No. 129 of 1920, and on the 23rd June 1920 this execution case was dismissed for default. In these circumstances it cannot reasonably be contended that the application for execution of the 18th April 1925 was in continuation of the former execution cases which had been determined ; and the first contention urged on behalf of the appellants, therefore, fails : Raghunath Saha v. Lalji Singh (1) ; Dukhiram Srimani v. Jogendra Chandra Sen (2). On the 14th April 1920, however, the learned Subordinate Judge of Anansole had passed the following stay order :

As it appears that the judgment-debtor Jogendra Lal Sirkar and others have instituted a suit for recovery of Rs. 3,170-15-6 for royalties against the decree-holders (in M. Suit No. 58 of 1918), on the petition of the judgment-debtors let the execution be stayed under O. 21, R. 29.

The judgment-debtors' suit was decreed by the Subordinate Judge of Asansole on the 16th June 1920. Against that decree an appeal was lodged, and the judgment-debtors' claim against the decree-holders was finally determined by a decree of the learned District Judge of Burdwan of the 24th November 1924. By this decree the learned District Judge of Burdwan awarded the judgment-debtors a sum of Rs. 2,253-14-0 and costs.

Upon these facts the appellants urged that the stay order of the 14th April 1920 remained in force until the claim in the judgment-debtors' suit was finally decided by the decree of the learned District Judge of Burdwan of the 24th November 1924, and that if the time that elapsed between the 14th April 1920 and the 24th November 1924 is excluded from the period of limitation the present application for execution was presented within the time limited by the statute of limitation. On the other hand, the respondents contend that the stay order remained in force only while the judgment debtors' suit was pending in the trial Court, and ceased to be operative after the decree was passed by the learned Subordinate Judge on the 16th June 1920. The adoption of the literal construction, for which the respondents contend, would provide an easy solution of the problem. But, in my opinion, such a construction would render nugatory the two-fold object which, I think, the legislature had in view when enacting O. 21, R. 29, namely, to prevent: (1) the judgment-debtor being compelled to satisfy the decree by providing the sum due when it might be proved (after his claim against the decree-holder was finally determined) that on balance he owed the decree-holder less than the decretal sum or, it might be, nothing at all; (2) the multiplicity of execution proceedings.

(1) [1896] 23 Cal. 397.

Now, it may well happen, after a stay order has been passed under O. 21, R. 29, that the trial Court might dismiss the suit, while on appeal a sum might be decreed in favour of the judgment-debtor, and on a further appeal he might be awarded a sum larger than that for which the decree-holder had obtained his decree. In that event the result of adopting the construction which the respondents have urged upon us would be that both the objects which the legislature had in mind when enacting O. 21, R. 29, would be defeated: on the other hand, if the view for which the appellants contend is accepted the decree-holder need suffer no hardship by reason of the delay necessarily incident to an appeal by the judgment-debtor, for under R. 29, the executing Court is at liberty to grant a stay of execution upon whatever terms it thinks fit. There is no magic in the words "until the pending suit has been decided" for it is conceded by the learned advocate for the respondents that the executing Court in any case would have jurisdiction under S. 151 to grant a further stay if the judgment-debtor preferred an appeal. In my opinion, the words "until the pending suit has been decided" mean until the claim in the pending suit has finally been decided. The result, therefore, is that the application for leave to execute the decree of the 14th January 1918, that was preferred on the 18th April 1925, was not barred by limitation; the appeal will be allowed and the order under appeal set aside. It is represented to us that an appeal has been preferred to the High Court from the order of the learned District Judge of Burdwan of the 24th November 1924. The execution proceedings will be returned to the learned Subordinate Judge of Asansole to be disposed of according to law. Whether the learned Subordinate Judge adjourns or dismisses or otherwise determines the present application for execution is a matter that must be left to the decision of the learned Subordinate Judge; and the costs of this appeal will abide the event; the hearing-fee is assessed at two gold mohurs.

Graham, J.—The sole question involved in the appeal is whether the application for execution was time barred or not, and the answer turns upon the proper construction O. 21, R. 29, Civil P. C., and in particular upon the meaning of the words "pending suit has been decided" which occur therein. Do these words merely refer to the suit or do they include an appeal, if any, and mean "finally decided," that is to say, after all rights of appeal have been exhausted. If the former is the case then the plea of limitation must prevail, while if the latter view is correct, then that plea fails.

The learned vakil for the respondents has called our attention to O. 22, R. 11 whereby that order is made applicable to appeals as well as suits and has argued that from the fact that there is no similar provision in the case of O. 21, R. 29 it may be inferred that the word "suit" in the latter rule was not intended to include "appeal." The word "suit" has not been defined in the Code, and it is possible to interpret it in two ways: either as restricted to the suit itself, or as meaning a suit from commencement until final decision, that is to say, as including the period of appeal, if any. On the whole I am of opinion that the better view is that the word was intended to include period of appeal and that "decided" means "finally decided." The adoption of the other view would entail multiplicity of proceedings which it has always been the object of the legislature to avoid.

For these reasons I agree with my learned brother that the appeal must be allowed.

Civil P. C., S. 92—Removal of trustee—Grounds illustrated.

In the case of removal of a trustee the Court should be guided by considerations of the welfare of the trust estate, and before a removal of the trustee is directed, a clear necessity for the intervention of the Court to save the trust property must be established. It is not every mismanagement or neglect of duty which will induce the Court to remove a trustee. There must be such gross negligence or misconduct as to evidence a want either of capacity or of fidelity which is calculated to put the trust in jeopardy. Failure in the discharge of duty on account of mistake or misunderstanding is not a ground for removal unless such failure shows want of capacity to manage the trust. A trustee may be removed if he fraudulently misapplies the revenues of the trust property and grossly misbehaves himself in the execution of the trust: for example, if he renews a lease for his personal benefit, purchases the trust property, concurs in a breach of trust, asserts a hostile title with knowledge that it was unfounded, fails to keep accounts, wrongfully alienates trust property, obstructs the management and wants only to waste the estate. Judgment.—This is an appeal by the defendant against what may be described as the preliminary decree in a suit under S. 92, Civil P. C.

The subject-matter of the litigation is a wakf which was created on the 24th September 1876 by a Mahomedan gentleman of the name of Mahomed Kabil Chaudhury, who died on the 3rd November 1876. He left two sons by two wives namely Manwar Ali and Mazafar Ali who became joint mutwalis. Manwar Ali died in 1895 and thereupon Muzaffar Ali continued to act as the sole mutwalli till his death in 1906. Thereafter disputes broke out as to the office of mutwalli. Plaintiff 1, who is the daughter of a son of the founder, sued to secure the office of mutwalli. The claim was resisted by the defendant who is the son of a daughter of the founder. After a protracted trial the defendant was appointed mutwalli on the 27th August 1907 by the primary Court. This decree was affirmed by this Court on appeal on the 1st July 1910. Plaintiff 1, thus defeated, instituted a suit in 1914 to set aside the wakf on the ground that it was an illusory endowment. The suit was dismissed by the trial Court on the 19th September 1916. That decree was affirmed in substance by this Court on the 26th April 1917, on the admission of the plaintiff that the wakf was valid and operative in law. Thus, baffled a second time, the plaintiff, along with several other persons, instituted the present suit on the 3rd April 1919, under S. 92, Civil P. C., for the removal of the defendant from the office of mutwalli and for the appointment of a new mutwalli. In the interval, plaintiff 1 had commenced another litigation against the defendant in 1918 for settlement of accounts and for recovery of arrears of maintenance. The hearing of that suit has been stayed pending the conclusion of the present litigation. The defendant contended that there was no reason why he should be removed from the office of mutwalli and that, if the wakf properties have not been managed in strict conformity with the directions of the founder, plaintiff 1, was more to blame than he himself. The District Judge took evidence as to the dealings of the defendant with the wakf estate and came to the conclusion that he was guilty of breach of trust and neglect of duty to such an extent that he should be removed from the office of mutwalli. The District Judge has further directed that a commissioner be appointed to examine the income and expenditure of the wakf estate.

In the present appeal, the conclusions of the District Judge as to the management of the wakf estate by the defendant have been controverted as not supported by the evidence on the record. It has further been urged that some at any rate of the transactions were not such as would justify an order for removal of the defendant from the office of mutwalli. Emphasis has naturally been laid on the previous history of the wakf estate and the embarrassment necessarily created by reason of the suits mentioned and numerous other litigations which involved an expenditure of large sums of money. We do not consider it necessary for our present purpose to examine the history of each of the instances of mismanagement given by the District Judge. The general impression left on our mind by the judgment of the District Judge is that he has laid undue stress upon matters of relatively small importance and that he should not have formed an opinion upon the question of the removal of the defendant from the office of mutwalli till the accounts of the income and expenditure of the wakf estate had been investigated by the commissioner. The principles which should regulate the action of the Court in cases of this description are well settled. The Court should be guided by considerations of the welfare of the trust estate, and before a removal of the trustee is directed a clear necessity for the intervention of the Court to save the trust property must be established. It is not every mismanagement or neglect of duty which will induce the Court to remove a trustee. There must be such gross negligence or misconduct as to evidence a want either of capacity or of fidelity which is calculated to put the trust in jeopardy. Failure in the discharge of duty on account of mistake or misunderstanding is not a ground for removal unless such failure shows want of capacity to manage the trust. As was observed by Lord Lingsdale, M. R. in Attorney-General v. Caius College (1), it is not enough to prove even considerable errors and irregularities in the management of the property or in the distribution of the income or in the conduct and management of the institution. The test is, is this the result of corrupt or improper motives; Attorney-General v. Clifton (2). These principles have been generally recognized and applied in cases in Indian Courts; Srinath v. Radhanath (3), Sathappayyar v. Periasami (4), Tiruvengadath Ayyangar v. Srinivas Thathachariar (5), Muhammed Jafar v. Muhammad Ibrahim (6), Nates v. Ganapati (7), Miyaji v. Ahmed Sahib (8), Fakuruddin Sahib v. Acken Sahib (9), Subba Naidu v. Gopala Swami (10) Ganapati Ayyan v. Savithri Ammal (11), Raja of Kalahasti v. Ganapati (12), Chintaman v. Dhondo (13), Annaji v. Narayan (14), Damodar v. Bhogilal Kasandas (15), and Girdharlal v. Naranlal (16). These cases all support the view that a trustee may be removed if he fraudulently misapplies the revenues of the trust property and grossly misbehaves himself in the execution of the trust, for example if he renews a lease for his personal benefit, purchases the trust property, concurs in a breach of trust, asserts a hostile title with knowledge that it was unfounded, fails to keep accounts, wrongfully alienates trust property, obstructs the management and wants only to waste the estate. It is necessary that these principles should be borne in mind by the District Judge when he reconsiders the case.

We are of opinion that, in the circumstances disclosed, this appeal should be allowed and the decree of the District Judge set aside. The case will be remitted to him in order that he may in the first place carefully examine the state of the accounts as disclosed in the report of the commissioner. Both parties will be entitled to take exceptions to that report and to justify the objections they may advance before the District Judge. Meanwhile the defendant will continue to hold the office of mutwalli. The previous history of the endowment leaves little doubt that great embarrassment has been caused by the constant ill-feeling between the plaintiffs and the defendant, and that even a stranger, as receiver, has not found it easy by any means to manage the estate effectively. We accordingly direct that the present receiver be discharged and that the defendant and Khan Sahab Abdul Khaleck, pleader of Feni, be appointed joint receivers. They will not be called upon to furnish security, but the District Judge will direct that all collections be brought into Court periodically so that the risk of waste may be minimized. The District Judge will also draw up an ad interim scheme for the management of the trust property. We are convinced that a new scheme for management of the trust estate must ultimately be framed for the management of the institution; economic conditions have changed considerably since the day when the founder created the endowment and alterations are manifestly needed in the scheme, if the wishes of the founder are to be carried out effectively. It has been represented to us that persons entitled to annuities have not received payment for a considerable time. Upon application made to the District Judge, he will give such directions in respect of these as also other matters as may be justified by the circumstances.

Each party will pay his costs in this Court; but the defendant will be entitled to pay out of the estate the costs he has actually incurred.

Civil Rule No. 919 of 1927, Decided on 16th November 1927, from order of Sub-Judge, Bogra, D/- 28th April 1927.

Practice—Procedure of putting both parties in the witness-box without putting them on oath is irregular.

The procedure of putting both parties in the witness-box after the case has been closed without putting them on oath and let each talk to the other is not warranted by law and vitiates the whole trial. [P 227 C 2]

Judgment.—In this matter the plaintiff sued to recover Rs. 500, the balance due on a certain jute transaction. The defendant, in his written statement, stated that the case was false, but, on the other hand, he was entitled to a certain amount from the plaintiff. He did not mention in his written statement in the suit that he had sued in the Court of the 2nd Munsif for his counter-claim, the suit which was dismissed a little over a month after the present suit before the Small Cause Court Judge was disposed of. The case came on for hearing. The Judge heard the plaintiff and his witnesses, the defendant and his witnesses and arguments on both sides. It then appears that he took the ordinary noon-day adjournment and, on coming back to the Court, it is admitted by him in the explanation he furnished, he put the plaintiff and the defendant both in the box to confront each other and note their demeanour and did not swear them but heard them argue in support of their cases. It appears that they said nothing more than what they stated in evidence. He then let them leave the box and passed judgment dismissing the suit.

This Rule has been obtained on the ground that the procedure in putting those two parties in the box without putting them on oath, and let each talk to the other is not warranted by law and has vitiated the whole trial. No doubt, in his explanation, the learned Judge says that he decided on the evidence, but he had to decide on that evidence considering the probabilities of the case, and it is difficult to believe, in deciding as to who was more likely to speak the truth, that what occurred after the lunch did not weigh with him in some way, even though he does not think that he did and it is clear that this method of putting the two men into the box after the case had been concluded, excepting for judgment, is not warranted by law. I am, therefore, compelled in the circumstances to set aside the decree in the case and remit the case for a rehearing. The case must be tried by some other Judge with the necessary powers, and if there is none in the Civil Division of Pabna and Bogra it will be transferred to a Judge exercising such Small Cause Court jurisdiction in the District of Rajshahi.

In the circumstances, I pass no order as to costs.

Judgment.—This is an appeal by the Local Government under the provisions of S. 417, Criminal P. C. against an order of acquittal passed by the First Additional Sessions Judge of Mymensingh in a case in which the two accused before us were charged before him and a jury under S. 395, I. P. C. The case is in many ways an extraordinary one, and it is desirable, therefore, to set out the facts briefly.

The two accused, Jahey Sheikh and Katua alias Jabad Ali, were charged with having committed an offence punishable under S. 395, I. P. C. They were duly committed to take their trial in the Sessions Court. The first Additional Sessions Judge of Mymensingh, Mr. N. V. H. Symons, tried the case with the aid of a jury. On the 9th March 1927 the trial was concluded and the jury were directed to retire and bring in their verdict. What happened thereafter is set out below as appears from the record:

Q. As regards both accused are you unanimous.

A. Yes.

Q. What is your verdict?

A. Guilty under S. 395, I. P. C.

Q. Did you find that Ismat mentioned Katua's name immediately after the occurrence?

A. We thought it unlikely that the family could have made up the story so soon, and we did not think that the explanations of the accused about enmity were sufficient to enable Abdul to bring a false case.

The jury is then charged again on the matter concerned in the last question. They retired at 3-53 p. m. and returned at 4-30 p. m.

Q. Do you find that Ismat mentioned Katua's name immediately after the occurrence?

A. No, we find that he did not.

Q. Does the jury wish to make any statement about their verdict of guilty?

A. We did not follow the meaning of "fair complexion," nor did we understand fully the importance of the passage in the ejahar, and the evidence of the independent witnesses. We now see that Katua is a dark man, and that Ismat could not have mentioned his name as he has said that he only knew him by sight. We wish to amend our verdict and return a unanimous verdict of not guilty.

As will be seen from the above the jury at first brought in a unanimous verdict of guilty against the accused under S. 395, I. P. C. The learned Additional Sessions Judge apparently was of a contrary opinion and he proceeded to charge the jury again. After the second charge was finished the jury retired again and returned at 4-30 p. m. What the learned Additional Sessions Judge stated to the jury in the course of the second charge does not appear from the record. But it appears from the record that he had previously anticipated the jury's bringing in, in the first instance, a verdict of guilty against the accused and that he had intended to refer the case to this Court for final orders. With that view he had written out a letter of reference and signed the same, but it appears that having regard to the events which subsequently happened he placed the letter of reference on the record though he had not dispatched the same to this Court. The procedure adopted by the learned Additional Sessions Judge is one which is entirely opposed to the procedure laid down in the Criminal Procedure Code and is one for which there is no warrant anywhere in the law obtaining in British India.

In this view of the matter we cannot allow the verdict of the jury to remain. We must set aside the verdict of the jury and set aside the order of acquittal, dated 9th March 1927, and direct that the matter be sent back in order that the accused may be retried in accordance with law before the Sessions Judge of Mymensingh.

Appeal No. 139 of 1921, Decided on 26th June 1923, against original decree of Sub-Judge, Second Court of Backergunj, D/- 21st March 1921.

Contract Act, S. 60—The debts for which sums are applied must be proved to have lawfully existed.

When the creditor invokes the aid of S. 60, it is incumbent upon him to establish that there was a lawful debt actually due and payable to him from the debtor for the satisfaction of which the sums paid have been applied by him: *Cory Bros & Co. v. Dwarka Nath Chakraborty and Kalinkinkar Chakraborty—for Appellant.

Narendra Chandra Bose and Satyen-dra N. Mitter—for Respondent.

Mookerjee, J.—This is an appeal by the defendants in a suit for arrears of rent. The plaintiff claims rent from the defendants at the rate of Rs. 4,794-4-6, annually with cesses and damages in respect of two years (Bhadra 1324 to Bhadra 1326). The defendants resist the claim on the ground, amongst others, that the payments made by them from time to time wiped out the debt. The Subordinate Judge has overruled this contention and decreed the suit in part. On the present appeal the defendants have argued that the Subordinate Judge has not really investigated the points urged in defence.

It is admitted that the defendants hold 19 distinct tenancies under the plaintiff and that from time to time they paid to the plaintiff Rs. 61,889 on account of rent and cesses. The defendants urge that this sum has wiped out all the arrears due in respect of all the 19 tenancies held by them. The plaintiff contends, on the other hand, that he has applied the sums paid in satisfaction of the arrears due on the other 18 tenancies, and that, after the balance has been appropriated in partial satisfaction of the arrears due in respect of the tenancy now in suit, a substantial sum is still recoverable.

It is not disputed that at the time the alleged payments were made the defendants did not direct how the sums were to be appropriated. Consequently the rule enunciated in S. 60, Contract Act, became applicable. That section is in these terms :

Where the debtor has omitted to intimate and there are no circumstances to indicate, to which debt the payment is to be applied, the creditor may apply it at his own discretion to any lawful debt actually due and payable to him from the debtor, whether its recovery is or is not barred by the law in force for the time being as to the limitation of suits.

When the creditor invokes the aid of this principle, it is incumbent upon him to establish that there was a lawful debt actually due and payable to him from the debtor for the satisfaction of which the sums paid have been applied by him: Cory Bros. & Co. v. Owners of Turkish Steamship Mecca (1), Munisami Mudali v. Perumal Mudali (2). The Subordinate Judge was accordingly not correct when he said that "the present suit in respect to a different tenancy," that is, a tenancy different from the 18 tenancies mentioned, "cannot be converted into an account suit." The question whether the sums alleged to have been appropriated by the plaintiff in satisfaction of arrears due on the 18 tenancies had been lawfully applied, must be investigated, before it can be held that the sum credited to the claim now in suit was correctly determined.

It may appear at first sight that this is a question free from complexity and obscurity. Unfortunately for the plaintiff, however, there are peculiar circumstances which have placed him in a situation of some embarrassment. It had so happened that in respect of 10 out of 19 tenancies lands accreted by the recession of a public navigable river and the Secretary of State for India in Council took steps for the assessment of the additional land with revenue. This proceeding culminated in an order of 27th April 1914, whereby the Board of Revenue determined, contrary to the contention of the plaintiff, that the crown had a right to assess the land under Act 9, 1847. Thereupon on 27th July 1915, the plaintiff instituted a suit against the Secretary of State for India in Council for declaration that the assessment had been made without jurisdiction, because the lands, which were alleged to be additional lands, were in fact comprised within his permanently settled estate. The plaintiff was successful in the Court of first instance, and on 6th October 1917, the Subordinate Judge made a declaration in his favour that the assessment was ultra vires. There was an appeal to this Court which was heard in the first instance by a Division Bench and ultimately came up for disposal before a Bench of three Judges under Cl. 15, Letters Patent : Secretary of State v. Narendra Nath (3). The final decree of that Court was made on 30th August 1920. The result of that decision was that the assessment by the Crown was held to be ultra vires in part : in other words in respect of a portion of the disputed land the Crown was held not competent to assess the land with revenue under Act 9, 1847. It was during the pendency of that litigation that on 23rd December 1919, the plaintiff commenced the present action for recovery of rent of the tenancy now in suit for the years 1917-1919. It has been stated before us that there is no question of accreted lands so far as the present tenancy is concerned.

But as we have already explained, in the application of S. 60, Contract Act, to the facts of this litigation, it becomes necessary to consider what was the amount recoverable by the plaintiff from the defendants in respect of the other 18 tenancies. Ten of those tenancies comprised accreted lands. If the assessment made by the Crown is ultra vires in part, the question must consequently arise on what basis is the plaintiff entitled to recover rent from the defendants in respect of the so-called additional land. It has further been urged before us that in the contingency which has happened, if the plaintiff is not entitled to realize rent on the basis of the entries made in the settlement by the Government, he would, in any event, be entitled to rent on the basis of the contract between the parties. That is a question which cannot be determined on the materials before us. There is thus no escape from the position that the decree made by the Subordinate Judge in favour of the plaintiff cannot be affirmed because it is based on an assumption which has not been established and cannot, on the materials before us, be accepted as well founded. That assumption is that the plaintiff has correctly appropriated sums paid by the defendants with regard to his dues in respect of the other tenancies.

The result is that this appeal is allowed, the decree of the Subordinate Judge set aside and the case remitted to him in order that it may be retried on the lines indicated. Upon retrial the defendants will not be entitled to succeed to the extent of more than the sum at which the present appeal has been valued, namely, Rs. 5,500. The appellants are entitled to their costs in this Court, but the costs of the trial in the lower Court both before and after remand, will be in the discretion of the lower Court.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case it appears that there were two separate cases in each of which the accused were convicted by the trial Court. An appeal was brought in each case by the convicted persons and they came before the learned Additional Sessions Judge of Dacca. His procedure was this: He tried the two appeals together as one case and made up his mind that there were two contradictory stories. Having found which of the two stories was true and having found that the other was untrue, he allowed one of the appeals and dismissed the other. It seems reasonably plain that the duty of the learned Judge was to keep each appeal absolutely separate and to deal with it on its merits, confining himself to the evidence given in that case and in that alone. As one of these appeals has been allowed and the persons have been acquitted that matter is not before us; but as regards the parties whose appeal has been dismissed this application is brought. In our opinion, the rule should be made absolute. The appeal in this case must be heard again, and we direct that it be heard by a different learned Judge to be nominated by the Sessions Judge. The petitioners will remain on bail to the satisfaction of the District Magistrate pending the rehearing of the appeal.

Defendant pleaded that there was a petition filed by the defendant for proceedings taken against the plaintiff under S. 107, Criminal P. Judgment.—This Rule has been issued to show cause why the decree passed by the Small Cause Court Judge of Barpeta, dated 31st March 1927, should not be set aside. The rule has been issued at the instance of the defendant in a suit. The plaintiff claimed damages from the defendant on the allegations that certain crops which had been grown by him were attached at the instance of the defendant and that subsequently the land was given back to the plaintiff, but that the crops which had been attached were damaged and, in consequence thereof, the plaintiff alleged, he was entitled to recover damages. The defence of the defendant, so far as it was necessary for the purpose of the argument that had been advanced on his behalf was that there was a petition filed by the defendant for proceedings being taken against the plaintiffs under S. 107, Criminal P. C., and that, while the said proceedings were either pending or under contemplation, the paddy standing on the land was attached by the police and kept in the custody of a third person named Ranjit Ram Keot and that the damage that had been caused to the paddy was caused during the time that it was in such custody. The defendant states in his petition to this Court that the said attachment was apparently made under the provisions of S. 146, Criminal P. C. It may be stated, however, that the materials on the record are wholly insufficient for the purpose of arriving at a definite conclusion as to the circumstances under which and the provisions of the law in consonance with which the said order of attachment was made. All that appears from the record is that the paddy was attached by the Police and kept in the custody of Ranjit Keot and that an order was passed by the criminal Court, on the 16th March 1926, which ran in these words:

This primarily is a matter for the civil Court to decide as to who should get the paddy. If the claim is decided here, it will not be final. Proceedings struck off.

The Munsif gave the plaintiff a decree for Rs. 54, that is to say, the price of 27 maunds of paddy calculated at the rate of Rs. 2 per maund.

The substantial contention that has been urged in support of the rule is to the effect that inasmuch as the paddy was not in the custody or possession of the defendant, but that the police had made it over to a third person named Ranjit Ram Keot, it should be taken that such attachment was made under some sort of order legally passed by a Court of competent jurisdiction as a presumption should always be made in favour of the validity of an act done by a public servant, and, if that view be taken, the petitioner cannot be held responsible for any damages that may have been caused to the paddy. In support of this contention reliance has been placed upon the decision in the case of Peruvian Guano Co. v. Dreyfus (1) and a passage in Mayne on Damages, 10th Edn. p. 394, where the principles laid down in that case have been discussed. Broadly stated, the principle laid down by the House of Lords in that case was that, where the possession of some property becomes the possession of the Court, a person, at whose instance the rightful owner may have been deprived of his possession in respect of property no longer remains liable for any damages that may be caused to it.

To apply that principle to the present case it will be necessary to find such as was found in that case, that the paddy passed into the custody of the Court—a fact with regard to which there is absolutely no evidence and no attempt even appears to have been made on behalf of the petitioner to establish that it was really under the order of the Court that the paddy was taken possession of or that the possession of Ranjit Keot could in any sense be construed as being the possession of the Court. If the attachment that was made by the police was made in the exercise of those powers which the police have for the prevention of a breach of the peace, either with or without reference to a Magistrate, the latter not acting in his judicial capacity, it stands to reason that the attachment cannot be said to have been made under an order passed by a Court of competent jurisdiction and the person in whose custody the property is kept can hardly be said to be in possession on behalf of the Court. If the attachment was made under an order of the Magistrate under S. 146, Criminal P. C., of which, however, there is no evidence, it may be said that the property was custodia legis and for certain purposes the possession of the Court will have to be treated as being the possession of the rightful owner for instance, as regards the question of limitation, such as was held in the case of Abinash Chandra v. Tarini Charan (2). So long, however, as the defendant is unable to establish that the Court was in possession it is obvious that he remains liable for all the damages that may have been caused to the property in respect of which he has wrongfully put the plaintiff out of possession. The principle was very well stated in the case of Smith v. L. & S. W. Ry. (3), where it was stated that in a case originating even in negligence: the person guilty of it is equally liable for its consequences, whether he could have foreseen them or not.

The principle applies with greater force to a case where it is not merely negligence but a wilful wrong that is committed. Such a person remains liable much more for the consequences,—at least for the natural consequences—of his wilful wrong. The facts that false allegations were made to the effect that the defendant himself was the owner of the paddy, having grown the same, and that upon the basis of such false allegations proceedings under S. 107, were sought to be instituted and that the plaintiff was kept out of possession of the paddy which really belonged to him, the paddy being taken by the police and made over to a third person for safe custody, these facts, taken together establish a case of wilful wrong as against the defendant and unless he is able to show that there are circumstances which would justify the Court in passing the order which would have the effect of enabling him to escape from the responsibility for the natural consequences of his act I think the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages from him. That an action of this description based on grounds such as appear in the present case is maintainable is apparent from the cases of Mudvirapa Kulkarni v. Fakirapa Kenardi (4) and Goma Mahad v. Gokaldas Khimji (5), and other cases which need not be specifically mentioned. I Jury Reference No. 24 of 1924, Decided on 24th July 1924.

(a) Evidence Act, S. 114—The evidence of an accomplice must be viewed with all the suspicion which ordinarily attaches to it.

Where the accomplice makes his confession and sticks to it, and he actually allows himself to be convicted upon it, no doubt to that extent, there is some sort of guarantee of its truthfulness, but he remains an accomplice with all the suspicion attaching to an accomplice, and his evidence must be viewed with all the suspicion which ordinarily attaches to the evidence of an accomplice. [P 234 C 1]

(b) Criminal P. C., S. 307—Jury returning their unanimous verdict of guilty in spite of warning by the Judge—It was held to be a proper case for reference.

Where the learned Judge, in delivering his charge placed before the Jury all the evidence and pointed out the grave defects in the case for the prosecution, and where, in spite of his warning, the jury were unanimous in finding all the accused guilty:

Held: that reference under S. 307, was proper.

A. K. Basu—for the Crown.

Krishna Kamal Moitra—for Complainant.

Walmsley, J.—This is a reference made under the provisions of S 307, Criminal P.C., by the Sessions Judge of Rajshahi. Four persons, Komoruddin Sheikh, Kadar Mandal, Majidullah Biswas and Jahir Mandal were placed on their trial upon a charge framed under S. 395, I.P.C. The story briefly was as follows: These men and others attacked the house belonging to one Iswar Chunder Ghose on the night of 28th July last year. Iswar Ghose fired a gun injuring one of the men who died in his court yard. The other men got away. It is said that the injured man was one Mohamed and that he named several of his accomplices. One Enaz was subsequently arrested and, immediately after his arrest, he made a confession and, upon his plea of "guilty," he was convicted by the learned Judge. He afterwards gave evidence in this case. The present accused were arrested before Enaz, and the enquiry before commitment was taken up by one Magistrate and finished by another. Then apparently Iswar Chunder Ghose was placed on his trial in regard to the shooting of the man who was shot in his court yard. He was discharged in January and the present case came on for trial in March.

The trial occupied some days, over twenty witnesses being examined. The learned Judge, in delivering his charge which I think was extremely fair, placed before the jury all the evidence and pointed out the grave defects in the case for the prosecution. In spite of his warning the jury were unanimous in finding all the accused guilty. The learned Judge thinks that that verdict is wrong and feels unable to accept it and, in consequence, he has made this reference under S. 307, Criminal P. C.

Now, with regard to the occurrence of the dacoity, I do not think it necessary to express any opinion. It is enough to say in passing that there are many features in the story for the prosecution which give rise to considerable suspicion. The real question in the case is whether these four men were actually identified as taking part in the dacoity. I cannot but think that if more attention had been paid to this branch of the matter in the lower Court by those who represented the accused, the verdict might have been different.

Now, the evidence against the accused persons may be considered as of four kinds. First, there is the evidence of two witnesses who say that they saw some of these men going away shortly after the occurrence. The witnesses who say so are Mohesh Chunder Ghose and Panchananda Ghose. The former says that he recognized Raisuddin who was not on his trial and Jaher. The latter says he recognized Kader, Komoruddin and Enaz. Now, the difficulty about accepting this evidence is: first, that the Sub-Inspector says that those witnesses told him nothing of the kind; and, secondly, that the evidence of the other persons who gathered at the house shows that there was nothing said by those men about the recognition of the dacoits when they came to the house.

The next piece of evidence is the evidence derived from the injured man Mohamed. It is said that, as he lay dying, questions were put to him as to who were the persons who accompanied him and he gave several names. The names, according to the witnesses, are Kader, Komoruddi, Raisuddi and Nager. The chowkidar of the house Krishna Tirandaz adds another one Majit. But his evidence is extremely unsatisfactory. Now, the difficulty about accepting this evidence, as a statement made by Mohamed, is great. The first point is that, although the witnesses all say that the injured man was Mohamed, the first case set up by the prosecution was that nobody knew who he was and a witness was actually produced in the Sessions Court from another village to say that the man he found lying in the court yard was identified by him as Mohamed. Further, the evidence about the questions that were put to him and the persons who were present when the questions were put and the answers given is very unsatisfactory.

The next piece of evidence is the statement of Enaz. This man was arrested on 4th November. He made his confession the next day, 5th November. It is true that he stuck to it and he actually allowed himself to be convicted upon it. To that extent there is some sort of guarantee of its truthfulness, but he remains an accomplice with all the suspicion attaching to an accomplice. In cross-examination he says that he made this confession in the hope of being pardoned, which I take to mean "in the hope of being made an approver," and it is quite possible; but there is no evidence to that effect that some hope was held out to him in that respect. Whether that is so or not he is an accomplice and his evidence must be viewed with all the suspicion which ordinarily attaches to the evidence of an accomplice.

The last piece of evidence is the statement made or said to have been made by Jahir to his father's landlord, Solomon, shortly after the occurrence. It seems to me very strange that a person who has committed a dacoity should, before anybody has begun to suspect him go and say that he has committed the dacoity and ask what is to be done and tell his landlord all about it. Jahir says that he did not make this statement and it is difficult to believe the story told against him.

This is all the evidence against the accused except a few fragments which have been placed before us by the learned counsel appearing for the Crown. He has pointed out that Komoruddin was seen with Enaz shortly after the occurrence; that Kader told one of the witnesses about the affair on the following morning before news of it from other sources reached the neighbourhood; and that Majidulla who is a cultivator, was reported absent by the chowkidar on the night of the occurrence. These are very slender pieces of evidence. Taken on the whole, I think the learned Judge's comments, as contained in his letter of reference on the evidence connecting those accused persons with the crime, are correct and show a proper estimate of their value. In my opinion, therefore, the view taken by the jury is contrary to the evidence and ought not to be accepted and I agree with the learned Judge in thinking that the accused are entitled to a verdict of not guilty. The result is that, in my opinion, the reference ought to be accepted, the accused acquitted and set at liberty.

Civil P. C., O. 38, Rr. 9 and 11—Attachment ends when suit abates.

When a suit abates and comes to an end on the death of a party, the attachment before judgment dies with it : 13 C. L. J. 243 and 45 Cal. 780, Foll. [P 235 C 1]

Page, J.—The decree in this suit cannot stand. The dispute has arisen in this way. The plaintiff-respondent brought a suit for money against one Uma Charan who was the owner of the property in dispute and before judgment obtained an order for attaching the property on 31st August 1915. On 11th November 1915 he obtained an ex-parte decree against Uma Charan. It is common ground, however, that between the date of attachment and the date of the decree Uma Charan died, the result being that as against him the decree was a nullity. As an application was not made for substituting the heirs within the time limited by law, the suit abated and died. In August 1916, after the suit had come to an end, Uma Charan's heirs sold the property in dispute to defendant 1 who alone contested the suit, the other defendants being impleaded merely as pro forma defendants. Subsequently, on 5th January 1918, an application was made on behalf of the plaintiff to set aside the heirs in place of Uma Charan. This application was granted, and, on 5th April 1918, the plaintiff obtained a second ex-parte decree against the heirs of Uma Charan. Thereafter he issued execution and, on 1st November 1919, purchased the property in dispute at the execution sale as defendant 1 who had purchased the property in the manner which I have stated from Uma Charan's heirs, was not prepared to give the plaintiff possession, the present suit was lodged for khas possession and a declaration of the plaintiff's title to the property. Both Courts have decreed the plaintiff's suit.

But for the fact that the two Courts have passed a decree in favour of the plaintiff I should have thought that the plaintiff's case was unarguable. It depended upon the attachment before judgment being in existence actually or constructively until after the second ex-parte decree was obtained. But when the suit abated and came to an end on the death of Uma Charan the attachment died with it. In my opinion the appeal is concluded against the respondent both upon principle and by Sasirama Kumari v. Meherban Khan (1) and Abdul Rahman v. Amin Sharif (2). The learned vakil, on behalf of the respondent, sought to distinguish these cases upon the ground that in these two cases the suit came to an end because it was dismissed and a suit which is dismissed differs from a suit which abates. True, the cause of its death is different, but in either case, it is equally dead, and, if it is dead the attachment before judgment dies with it. The second point which is taken is that the effect of the order setting aside the abatement and restoring the case was to revive also the attachment before judgment. These two cases to which reference has been made are authorities to the contrary. There is no substance in the plaintiff's case. The appeal, therefore, will be allowed, the decree of the appellate Court and the decree of the Court of first instance set aside and the suit dismissed with costs in all the Courts.

Abdul Rashid — Complainant — Opposite Party.

Criminal Revn. No. 1023 of 1923, Decided on 31st January 1924.

Penal Code, S. 478—Goods subject of the mark in question must be proved to be manufactured by complainant and to be reputed to be his manufacture alone.

Under S. 478 complainant has to prove that the goods which are the subject of the mark are manufactured and sold by himself and that goods are known in the market as being of his manufacture alone. [P 236 C 2]

Where the article bearing the mark was proved to have been manufactured and sold by both the complainant and the accused on a large scale and there was no sufficient evidence to support the view that the article was reputed to be the complainants' exclusive manufacture:

Held: no offence was committed. [P 237 C 2]

P. L. Roy and Satindra Nath Mukherjee—for Petitioner.

K. N. Chowdhury and Probodh Kumar Das—for Opposite Party.

Judgment.—The accused Gobinda Chandra Roy has been convicted in this case by an Honorary Presidency Magistrate under the provisions of Ss. 482 and

(1) [1911] 13 C. L. J. 243=9 I. C. 918.

(2) [1918] 47 Cal. 780=44 I. C. 229=22 O. W. N. 927.

486, I. P. C. The conviction took place on the 31st August of last year and the accused was sentenced to pay a fine of Rs 50 in respect of the conviction under S. 486 and to pay a similar fine for the offence under S. 482. It appears that since the year 1918, or 1920 as the petitioner alleges, the complainant Abdul Rashid has sold on the market in Calcutta soap on which appears on the front a picture of Mr. Gandhi, at the top of which picture appears the word "Mahatma" and at its foot the word "Gandhi." On the back appear the letters "A. R. M. Ishaq" and the words "sole agent" and the letters "A. S. F." also appear which mean "American Soap Factory." The accused has been recently selling on the market soap similar in shape and colour, and bearing on the front a picture of Mr. Gandhi somewhat alike, but not indetical with the picture on the complainant's soap, and beneath the picture appears the name of Mr. Gandhi. On the back are the words "Indian Soap Company." Now the learned Magistrate has propounded three questions for consideration: Firstly, "Whether the complainant has the exclusive right to the trade mark used on his soaps which formed the subject-matter of the charges." Secondly "Has the right of the complainant been infringed by the accused"; thirdly, "are there circumstances to show that the accused is protected under the exception under Ss. 482 and 486"? He has found that the complainant has proved the user of the trade-mark and that soap manufactured by the complainant is known in the bazar as "Gandhi Brand Soap." He further found that there was satisfactory evidence to show that the complainant's "Gandhi Brand" soap had extensive sales in the market both in Calcutta and in the mofussil, and he further found that, having regard to the warning given to the accused and to his continuance of sales after such warnings, he did not act innocently and that he was not protected by the exception.

First of all, we have to see, before considering the sections themselves, what is the evidence which was before the Magistrate upon which he convicted the accused. There was a considerable volume of evidence to show that the complainant made extensive sales of the Gandhi mark soap in the markets. Abdul Rashid himself says that his factory was established in about 1918 and that his Gandhi mark soap had extensive sales in the markets in Calcutta and in the mofussils. The witness Abdul Samad stated that the Gandhi mark soaps had extensive sales. Witness Abdul Latiff stated that he used to purchase 50 or 60 cases of Gandhi mark soaps daily and to the value of Rs. 7,000 or Rs. 8,000 a year. He does not specifically state that his purchases were from the complainant, but I think that there is no doubt that this is what he meant. Abdul Majid stated that Gandhi brand soap belonged to the complainant's factory and that from last year he had purchased such soaps from the complainant's factory. Abdul Aziz stated that since 1327 he had been buying Gandhi brand soap from the complainant's factory and that he had been making large purchases of such soaps. Witness Mofizuddin stated that in the market Gandhi brand soap was known as the complainant's brand.

It seems to me that this evidence is not sufficient to establish what it is necessary for the complainant to establish having regard to the provisions of S. 478. Under that section he has to prove that the goods which are the subject of the mark are manufactured and sold by himself and that such goods are known in the market as being of his manufacture alone, and it seems to me that the evidence to which we have referred is not sufficient to support the claim put forward on the complainant's behalf, namely, that in the market Gandhi brand soap is known as being of his manufacture and of his manufacture alone. But when we consider the evidence given on behalf of the accused the complainant's evidence is of very little value. Witness Jogesh Chandra Ghosh, who was called on behalf of the accused, stated that since the year 1918 the National Soap Factory Company had been making and selling Gandhi brand soap in considerable quantity, and this is supported by the evidence of Ershad Ali Mallick who stated that his firm had been publicly selling Gandhi brand soap in the bazar for more than a year. Witness Roza Meah stated that Gandhi mark soap had been on the market for years and that he had been selling the accused's Gandhi brand soap for about four years. The evidence of Prosanno Kumar Dutta is to the same effect and so is that of Santosh Kumar Das Biswas. Lastly, witnesses Jogendra and Pran Bandhu stated that by Gandhi brand soap no soap of any particular company is meant. We think, having regard to the evidence put forward for the prosecution and the evidence put forward for the accused that it has not been sufficiently or satisfactorily established that Gandhi brand soap is generally known in the market as soap manufactured by the complainant. We think that there is abundant evidence that there have been sales of Gandhi brand soap by the National Soap Factory and others for a considerable period, and we do not think that the reputation established by the complainant according to the evidence would justify a conviction under Ss. 482 and 486. This, we think, is sufficient to dispose of this matter because the conclusion that we have come to upon the evidence is that the complainant has not proved that he has established in the market such a reputation as to justify him in claiming for his soap, exclusive use of Gandhi's portrait as a trade-mark in respect of his soap.

It is not necessary to refer to several other matters that were urged before us on behalf of the petitioner, namely, the fact that the declaration made on behalf of the National Soap Factory in respect of their Gandhi mark soap was made some three weeks prior to the declaration made on behalf of the complainant, nor I think it is necessary to deal with what is stated to be a wrong conclusion by the Magistrate, that the complainant started making soaps in the year 1918, nor to the mistake which the Magistrate has made with regard to Ex. (8) which he states is the complainant's stock-book whereas it is evidently the stock-book of the accused.

The result is that we do not think that there was before the Magistrate sufficient evidence to justify him in finding that the complainant's soaps were entitled to the exclusive user of the portrait of Mr. Gandhi or sufficient evidence to show that the soap bearing that impression was known in the market as the soap of the complainant and of no other maker. There is abundant evidence, we think, that the use of the Gandhi's portrait upon the soap has been common for four or five years in the bazar and that no manufacturer has established any exclusive rights of user of the Gandhi's portrait or name in respect of soap.

Having regard to the conclusion at which we have arrived the conviction is clearly bad and must be set aside, and we accordingly make the Rule absolute and direct that the fines, if paid, will be refunded.

Criminal Appeal No. 585 of 1927, and Civil Reven. Petn. No. 11 of 1927, Decided on 24th Nov. 1927, from order of Dist. Judge, Faridpur, D/- 25th June 1927.

Civil P. C., S. 115—Munsif holding that he had no jurisdiction to direct a complaint to be made under S. 476, Criminal P. C.—Appellate Court not deciding the question of jurisdiction but itself acting under S. 476-B—Procedure is irregular.

Where a Munsif, under S. 476, refused to direct a complaint to be made on the view that he had no jurisdiction in the matter, and an appeal was taken to the District Judge under S. 476-B, who, without deciding the question whether the Munsif had jurisdiction or not, purported to act under the section :

Held: that the District Judge erred in holding this view. It was also an error with respect to procedure. It is a material irregularity and the High Court should interfere in such a matter under S. 115. [P 238 C 1, 2]

Suresh Chandra Talukdar—for Appellant.

Khundkar—for the Crown.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case the learned District Judge of Faridpur has made an order directing that a complaint should be made against the appellant for an offence under S. 195 (i) (c), Criminal P. C., in respect that he forged a receipt and used that document in evidence in a certain suit before the Court of the 2nd Munsif of Goalundo knowing it to be forged.

The Munsif in the suit found that the receipt was a forgery and the two defendants applied to the Munsif for an order directing that a complaint should be made to a Magistrate against the present appellant. Before that application was disposed of the judicial officer in question was transferred and the case was by the order of the District Judge transferred to the Court of the first Munsif of Goalundo. That learned Munsif of Goalundo when the matter came before him under S. 476, Criminal P. C., refused to direct a complaint to be made on the view that he had no jurisdiction in the matter, he not being the Court referred to in S. 476 in respect that the alleged offence had not been committed in or in relation to a proceeding in his own Court but had been committed, if at all, in relation to proceeding in the Court of the Second Munsif of Goalundo who had tried the case. That being his view the learned First Munsif thought that he had no jurisdiction.

An appeal was taken to the District Judge under S. 476-B, and the first thing that the learned Judge had to decide was whether the view as to jurisdiction taken by the Court from whose order an appeal was being brought to him was right or wrong. If the learned First Munsif of Goalundo had no jurisdiction to make a complaint, and had rightly refused to make a complaint, the appeal should have been dismissed upon that ground. On the other hand, if the learned District Judge took the view that the learned First Munsif of Goalundo had jurisdiction, but had wrongly held that he had no jurisdiction then he would be entitled to make a complaint under S. 476-B. Upon the former view that there was no jurisdiction in the First Munsif of Goalundo, it might or might not have been proper for the learned District Judge to entertain an application if made under S. 476-A, and in that event, whether he granted the application or refused the application, an appeal would lie to this Court. This Court has already held that no appeal lies from an order made by a superior Court in its appellate powers under S. 476-B. It is entirely wrong, however, for the learned District Judge to think that whether or not the First Munsif of Goalundo had jurisdiction under S. 476, he, the learned District Judge, on an appeal therefrom, could make a complaint which the learned First Munsif could not have made. It seems to us, therefore, that the order before us is wrong in the sense that the learned District Judge has proceeded irregularly without enquiring properly into the correctness of the view taken by the First Munsif of Goalundo to the effect that there was no jurisdiction in his Court to entertain this particular application for complaint.

We cannot interfere with the order, however, as a matter of appeal, but it does seem to us that the error committed by the learned District Judge falls within S. 115, Civil P. C. It was an error with respect to jurisdiction. It is also an error with respect to procedure. It is a material irregularity and the view taken by the learned District Judge may operate to deprive the present appellant of a right of appeal. If the true view be that the learned District Judge's only power to make a complaint was, in the circumstances, under S. 476-A, it is quite clear that the erroneous procedure adopted in this case has deprived the appellant of a right of appeal. In these circumstances we must make an order sending this matter back to the learned District Judge in order that he may decide whether or not the Court from which the appeal was brought, rightly or wrongly, held that it had no jurisdiction. If it rightly so held then the appeal should be dismissed. It may or may not then happen that an application will be made to the learned District Judge under S. 476-A. We say nothing to limit the discretion of the learned District Judge in that event. On the other hand, if the learned District Judge takes the view that the First Munsif of Goalundo had jurisdiction to order a complaint, and had wrongly refused to do so, then it would be possible for him to make a proper order under S. 476-B, directing that a complaint should be lodged.

The appeal is dismissed, but an order is made, as stated, under S. 115, Civil P. C.

Criminal Appeal No. 534 of 1927, Decided on 2nd December 1927, from order of Sess. Judge, Sylhet-Cachar, D/-11th May 1927.

Penal Code, S. 84—Test of insanity given.

To ascertain a person is incapable of knowing the nature of the act or that he is doing what is either wrong or contrary to law, a very common test is to ask, in the circumstances, whether the man would have committed the act if a policeman would have been at his elbow.

[F 240 C 1]

Suresh Ch. Talukdar and Parimal Chandra Guha—for Appellant.
Khundkar—for the Crown.

Rankin, C. J.—The appellant in this case has been tried for the murder of his father on the 12th December 1926 in the morning before 8 o'clock. He has been convicted and sentenced to transportation for life and the real question in this appeal is whether or not he ought to be dealt with under the provisions of the law which apply to a person who, at the time of doing the act, by reason of unsoundness of mind, was incapable of knowing the nature of the act, or that he was doing what was either wrong or contrary to law. That is the test laid down by S. 84, I. P. C.

The story is a most extraordinary one. The appellant, his brother and his father were living together and the appellant and his father have been proved to have been on the best of terms. The brother's story is that on the morning in question when he woke up his father and his brother had gone out and it seems clear that soon after leaving the house the appellant with a dao cut off his father's head. He thereupon picked up the head wrapped it in something and was proceeding along the road to Silchar Court. He was seen by witness Saiyad Ali about the time he had passed the thana. Saiyad Ali having gone and reported to the thana what he had seen, constables overtook the accused who was walking quite in an ordinary way and persuaded him quietly to come back to the thana and to tell his story to the Assistant Sub-Inspector. The story he told was that he had a dream and that in that dream goddess Kali appeared to him and told him that either he would have to kill his father or his father would kill him. It would seem that this dream contained other elements; in particular, it contained the element that his father was a descendant of the goddess Kali and also that his father's tongue was black and that he was to take the head to the Court at Silchar.

When the story was first told to the Assistant Sub-Inspector the appellant was taken back to the house. He was taken to the threshing ground where his father's body lay, and the tea garden doctor who has given evidence saw him on that occasion. The accused told him that the previous night he had dreamt that if he did not kill his father his father would kill him. He said that Kali told him so in his dream. Kali said to him that his father's tongue was black and that his father was a descendant of the goddess Kali. He told me that his father would have killed him and so he killed his father. He told me that he dreamt that he had taken the head of his father to Silchar Court. He said that when he was bringing the head to Silchar he was stopped on the way and could not bring it. He said that his dream could not be realized as he could not take the head to Silchar. He told me this at the threshing floor. He was excited and his eyes were blood shot.

On the 13th December, i. e., the day after the occurrence the appellant made a confession before a Magistrate in which he said that unless he killed his father, he would die. He was under the observation of the Civil Surgeon for a considerable time because the occurrence having taken place in December the Magisterial enquiry was in March and the trial was in May. The Civil Surgeon said that the appellant had definite delusion, which passed off after a couple of months, that he could not tell right from wrong, that he was definitely insane and said that he wanted to dedicate his father's head to the goddess Kali. The Civil Surgeon said that from the story told to him he got the impression that the accused thought that he was ordered by Kali to kill his father. Witness Fagu the appellant's brother said that when the accused was brought to the threshing ground on 12th December he said: "I offer my father to the goddess Kali."

Now, on such facts as these a question arises which is a very difficult one; but the main ground of the decision of the learned Judge is that he does not think that it is proved that the appellant was under the impression that he was ordered to kill his father. He thinks the position merely is that the man was under a delusion that unless he killed his father his father would kill him; and accordingly, of the three assessors two for that reason, take the view that he was not insane and the learned Judge agrees with that view.

It is no doubt plain enough that under the doctrine in McNaughten's case there may be cases where the correct application of the law is to hold a man amenable for his action assuming merely that his particular delusion is true; but the proposition which governs the present case in the first instance is that contained in S. 84, I. P. C. We have to see whether this man is shown to have had no knowledge of the nature and quality of his act or, as the statute says:

incapable of knowing the nature of the act, or that he is doing what is either wrong or contrary to law.

A very common way of applying that test is to ask, in the circumstances, whether the man would have committed the act if a policeman had been at his elbow. Examining this case from that point of view I think it is very noticeable that this man having committed the deed, immediately picked up the head of his father and was proceeding to Silchar Court. The witness Saiyad Ali, who saw him first, said that he was not running. He did not proceed to run, but when the constables overtook him he came quietly back to the thana. He explained that he was going to Silchar Court and why he was going to Silchar Court, namely because of a dream which he had on the previous night. That seems to me to be the best evidence in this case upon the question whether he knew that what he was doing was "wrong or contrary to law"; and in view of that evidence, which is supported by other evidence in the case, particularly by the very strong evidence of the Civil Surgeon who is not only more competent to give but had far more opportunity than anyone else of forming a correct opinion, in my judgment this appeal should be allowed, the conviction and sentence should be set aside, and we should send this case back to the learned Sessions Judge of Cachar with a direction to deal with it under S. 471, Criminal P. C. on the basis that this man was not at the time of doing the act, by reason of unsoundness of mind, capable of knowing the nature of the act, or that he was doing that was either wrong or contrary to law. We come to the finding as required by S. 470, Criminal P. C., that he did the act, but that he was of unsound mind in the sense explained at the time. We accordingly direct that he be detained in safe custody in the Mental Hospital at Tezpur. We direct the Sessions Judge to take the action required by R. 54 of Assam Government Rules relating to lunatics.

Manmotha Nath Mukherjee and Herambo Chandra Guha—for Petitioner.

Manindra Kumar Banerjee — for the Crown.

Panton, J. — This rule is directed against the petitioner's conviction under S. 54-A, Calcutta Police Act. The police charged him and other persons under Ss. 407, 411 and 414, I. P. C. There was also a charge against him under the section just mentioned. An Honorary Presidency Magistrate tried these persons on 3rd May last and on that date recorded an order:

There is no good evidence against the accused. They are discharged under S. 253, Criminal P. C.

It appears that the petitioner was then again placed before the Honorary Magistrate to be tried for the offence under S. 54-A, whereupon the Magistrate made the following order

Put up before the Chief Presidency Magistrate. I do not wish to try this case as I have tried the connected case and this may be sent to some other Magistrate.

On this Mr. Wajid Ali, exercising apparently the powers of the Chief Presidency Magistrate, recorded the order "To my file" and adjourned the hearing to 16th May. On that date the petitioner appears to have raised an objection to his trial but the hearing was further adjourned to 29th May when a written petition was put in on his behalf claiming that he had already been acquitted of the charge on which he was then being tried. The Magistrate's order on this was

and proceed it did and resulted in the conviction which is the subject of this rule. It is not clear from an examination of the record whether it was intended to exclude the charge under S. 54-A from the first trial; any way, the Honorary Magistrate, by speaking of it as a "connected case," seems to have been under the impression that this charge had not been before him, an impression which resulted, I suppose, from the charge not having been pressed at the trial.

We think that in the present case, when the goods which formed the subject of the charge under Ch. 17, I. P. C., and of a charge under S. 54-A, Calcutta Police Act, were identical, the petitioner should have been tried for all these offences at one trial and should not have been subjected to two trials in respect to his possession of the same goods. We are of opinion that for this reason the second trial was bad and that the conviction in it must be set aside.

The rule is accordingly made absolute. The goods if still in existence, will be returned to the petitioner. The petitioner will be discharged from bail.

Judgment.—This is an appeal by the judgment-debtor in execution proceedings. The point urged before us is that under the provisions of S. 48, Civil P. C., the decree-holder's claim is barred by limitation. The material facts which it is necessary to state for the purpose of understanding the point which arises in this appeal are as follows :

The decree-holder obtained his decree on 30th May 1901, and in execution of that decree some decree of the Judicial Committee was attached in execution. There seem to have been various proceedings from time to time in execution in various years down to 1913 and 1914. In 1914 there was an appeal to this Court in respect of an order that had been made in favour of the decree-holder. The contention raised in that appeal was a similar contention to what is now raised before us, namely, that the decree-holder's rights were barred under the provisions of S. 48. The judgment of this Court was delivered in the year 1916 and it was there held that S. 48 had no application inasmuch as various proceedings that had been taken were not fresh proceedings in execution, but merely proceedings in continuation of a prior execution. Then, in 1918, a further application was made by the decree-holder to this Court. In that application the decree-holder asked that the proceedings should be treated as continuation of the execution cases which were therein mentioned and that an order should be passed for rateable distribution of the amount that might be realized from the decree of the Privy Council that had been attached. The order that was made on that application was passed on 10th September 1918 dismissing the application. The proceedings, as I have already stated, were for rateable distribution of the amounts received in respect of the decree of the Judicial Committee, and it seems to us that the reason for the order of 10th September 1918, and for the statement of the vakil who appeared for the decree-holder, namely, that no further steps remained to be taken, was the fact that at that time there was no fund available for rateable distribution realized by execution of the decree of the Judicial Committee. So far as the proceedings of 1918 are concerned one point has been made on behalf of the appellant, that these proceedings really are of no effect inasmuch as no notice of the proceedings was given to the judgment-debtor; but we think that there is nothing in this point because, as they were in fact proceedings in continuation of the prior execution cases, no notice was necessary to the judgment-debtor under the provisions of O. 21, R. 22. The provisions of that order only provide that notice should be given if an application is made more than a year after the decree or if it is made against the legal representative of a party to the decree and, therefore, if the proceedings of 1918 are to be treated as merely a continuation of the previous execution proceedings no notice to the judgment-debtor is necessary under the provisions of O. 21, R. 22, and, in our opinion, the proceedings of 1918 were not fresh proceedings in execution but were proceedings in continuation of the previous execution cases.

Then we come to the present application against the order in respect of which this appeal has been presented. That application was made on 27th June 1921; that is to say, within three years of the 1918 proceedings. The application of 27th June 1921 states that the receiver who had been appointed in respect of the decree of the Judicial Committee was dead and that there was no other receiver. The decree-holder asked that the heir of the judgment-debtor should be brought on the record and that notice should go to him under the provisions of O. 21, R. 22. He further asked that the amount due should be realized by the attachment and sale of the judgment-debtor's moveables. He also asked that the petition should be put up with the records of the previous execution cases and that execution proceedings might be carried on in continuation thereof. The order against which this appeal is presented was passed on 18th March 1922 and the order is that the proceedings should be treated as an application in continuation of the previous execution cases and the learned Judge holds that on this basis the application was within time. He declined to make any order with regard to the moveables and he stated that the pleader for the decree-holder said that he would not press for the attachment of the moveables and the learned Judge stated that clearly the applicant was not entitled to realize the decretal amount by attachment of the moveables. Now it seems to us that the application of 27th June 1921, in so far as it sought to attach the moveables, was a new application for execution within the provisions of S. 48, Civil P. C., and was clearly barred by time, and the only point we have got to decide is whether the application, so far as the second part of it is concerned, can be treated as being in continuance of the previous execution cases, and the conclusion we have come to is that we ought to so treat it and we think that the Court below has rightly decided the point.

One further point remains, namely, with regard to the application for notice to the heir of the judgment-debtor. I have felt some little doubt that but the conclusion I have come to is that that application does not necessarily make it a new application for execution within the provisions of S. 48. The result, therefore, is that we think that the Court below was right in treating the application as one in continuance of the previous execution cases and that the appeal accordingly fails.

It is, of course unfortunate that these execution proceedings should be so long protracted and the decree obtained so long ago as May 1901 should still be unsatisfied and still be incapable of being put in execution. But we can only take the provisions of the law as we find them, and, for the reasons as already stated, we think that the order of the Court below is quite correct and that, despite the lapse of time, it is still open to the decree-holder to execute his decree in the manner in which execution is sought, that is to say, in continuance of the prior proceedings. The respondent is entitled to his costs in this appeal. Hearing-fee, two gold mohurs.

(c) Calcutta Municipal Act (1923), S. 424—Scope.

Where the procedure prescribed by S. 424 of the Act was not followed, conviction under S. 412 was set aside.

Rajendra Bhusan Baksi — for Petitioner.

Judgment.—This Rule has been issued to show cause why the conviction and sentence of the petitioner under S. 412, Calcutta Municipal Act of 1923, should not be set aside. The Rule has been issued on three of the grounds stated in the petition. In answer to the Rule the learned Magistrate has submitted an explanation to this Court in which the grounds upon which the Rule has been issued are not attempted to be met. He relies upon the record which he made of what was supposed to be an admission of guilt on the part of the petitioner. The learned Magistrate says this in his explanation:

I have no personal recollection of what took place at the hearing, but it is impossible that I should have recorded the admission of the defendant who appeared without his having done so. On the charge being explained Lalji Ram admitted and pleaded guilty and thereupon I found him guilty and fined him Rs. 60, in default two months imprisonment.

The petitioner, in his petition to this Court, alleged that he did not plead guilty. He says that when he was called upon to plead he only said that the bottles had been taken from his shop and he remained silent and he apprehends that his silence was construed by the learned Magistrate as an admission of his guilt.

Of late several cases have come up to this Court from the Court of the learned Municipal Magistrate in which convictions were passed by him upon records of pleas as to admission of guilt on behalf of accused persons, and after such convictions this Court has been moved on the ground that there was no plea of guilty. It always becomes difficult in such cases to determine what exactly happened, unless the provisions of the law as to procedure are strictly followed. The present case was one under S. 412, Calcutta Municipal Act. It was a summons case and the procedure to be adopted for the trial of this case is what is laid down in the Code of Criminal Procedure with regard to the trial of summons cases. It appears that summons in this case was issued on 30th May 1924, and the date fixed for the case was 20th June 1924. On that day the petitioner was not present and the case was adjourned to 18th July 1924. On 18th July, presumably in the presence of the petitioner who had by that date appeared, the Food Inspector, Mr K. D. Banerjee, was examined as a witness on behalf of the prosecution and the case was thereafter adjourned to 25th July for further evidence. On 25th July the following note was made by the learned Magistrate:

Lalji admits and pleads guilty and I fine him Rs. 60; in default two months imprisonment.

It is difficult to see what was the procedure that was being adopted by the learned Magistrate in connexion with the trial of this case. In a summons case to which the provisions of Ch. 20 of the Code are applicable under S. 242, Criminal P. C., when the accused appears, or is brought before the Magistrate the particulars of the offence of which he is accused shall be stated to him, and he shall be asked if he has any cause to show why he should not be convicted. Under S. 243 if the accused admits that he has committed the offence of which he is accused his admission shall be recorded as nearly as possible in the words used by him, and if he shows no sufficient cause why he should not be convicted the Magistrate may convict him accordingly. Under S. 244, if the Magistrate does not convict the accused under S. 243, or if the accused does not make such admission the Magistrate should proceed to hear the complainant and take all such evidence as may be produced in support of the prosecution and also to hear the accused and to take all such evidence as he produces in his defence. On 18th July the learned Magistrate examined the complainant in the case and it would, therefore, appear that he was proceeding under S. 244, Criminal P. C., and not under S. 243, which would apply if there was admission by the accused that he had committed the offence for which he was being tried. Having adopted the procedure prescribed by S. 244 on the footing that there was no admission of guilt on the part of the accused person the learned Magistrate was not competent to take a further plea from the accused person of guilty and relieve himself of the duty of examining other witnesses who could be called on behalf of the prosecution for the purpose of proving the case. The result has been that in this case there has been really no evidence upon which there could be a conviction of the petitioner, and I am not prepared to hold that there was a plea of guilty with regard to the offence upon the basis of which the petitioner could have been convicted by the learned Magistrate. The law enjoins, and that for a very good reason, that the admission shall be recorded as nearly as possible in the words used by the accused. Omission to comply with the law in this respect cannot be countenanced as it invariably leads to complications.

Turning now to the grounds on which the Rule has been issued: it seems to me that the evidence that has been adduced in this case is not at all sufficient for the conviction. S. 412, Calcutta Municipal Act, makes it punishable to sell, store for sale, expose or hawk about for sale, or keep for sale food which is unsound, unwholesome or unfit for human food. The act itself provides for the method that has got to be adopted for the purpose of determining whether the food is unsound, unwholesome or unfit for human food. Of course there may be cases where it will not be necessary to send the objectionable article—I mean the food in respect of which the prosecution is started—for examination by a Public Analyst. But this was not a case of that description. It was thought necessary by the Food Inspector to send the bottles of aerated water to the Public Analyst for analysis. He states in his evidence this:

I found in the bottles of aerated water foreign particles floating inside. I showed it to the man who gave his name as Lalji Ram. I told him I am sending these four bottles to the laboratory for their analysis. Out of four bottles two were declared to be bacteriologically unfit for human food. The matter was reported to the vendor after receiving the report. Four bottles were made over to him. The vendor does not say that they are different bottles.

There is a procedure prescribed in the Act for insuring the examination of the identical food which is seized by the officers of the Municipality and sent for the purpose of analysis. This is laid down in S. 424 (4). That sub-section says that when any sale under sub-S. (1) or sub-S. (2) is completed, or when any food is surrendered under sub-S. (3), the Health Officer or the person authorized by him in this behalf, or any purchaser who wishes to have an article of food analyzed under S. 423, shall forthwith notify to the seller or his agent selling the articles or the person in possession thereof, as the case may be, his intention to have the same analyzed and shall divide the article into three parts, to be then and there separated and each part to be marked and sealed or fastened up in any manner which its nature will permit. Sub-S. (5) says that the Health Officer or the person authorized by him in this behalf, or the purchaser referred to in sub-S. (4), shall deliver one of the said parts to the seller or his agent, shall retain another for future comparison and may send the third to a Public Analyst. This procedure has been prescribed in order that there may be a guarantee of identity as to the article that is examined by the Analyst and the article that is seized by the Food Inspector, and in the absence of any guarantee to that effect it would be difficult for the Court to hold that what was examined by the Analyst was really what was taken from the vendor. In any event such procedure not having been adopted in the present case I am not prepared to hold that the report of the Public Analyst, whatever it was, was in respect of any of the bottles of aerated water which were taken from the shop of the vendor. Furthermore: the Analyst himself has not been examined in the case, though if his certificate had been put in and filed in the case on behalf of the prosecution he need not have been examined. Beyond the statement of the Food Inspector that he sent two bottles to the laboratory and received a report to the effect that their contents were bacteriologically unfit for human food there is nothing upon which it can be held that the petitioner committed the offence under S. 412.

The conviction of the petitioner therefore seems to be unjustifiable, and in that view of the matter I make the Rule absolute, set aside the conviction of the petitioner and the sentence passed upon him and direct that the fine if paid be refunded.

Guru Charan Das—Defendant 1—Appellant.

Port Canning and Land Improvement Co. Ltd. and another—Plaintiff and Defendant 2—Respondents.

Appeal No. 1340 of 1921, Decided on 30th November 1923, from appellate decree of Dist. Judge, 24-Pargannas, D/-15th February 1921.

Landlord and Tenant—Rent, suit for—Lease of lands in addition to land in actual possession of lessee and lessor entitled under lease to charge rent for area in actual possession—Suit is not bad for noninclusion of other land, and failure by landlord to give possession of the other land is no defence.

Where the lease was for the land in actual possession of the lessee and it was also provided that the lessor was entitled to charge rent in proportion to land in actual possession.

Held: that a suit for rent was bad not for non-inclusion of other lands, and the landlord's failure to give possession of the other lands was no defence to the suit.

Abinash Ch. Ghose—for Appellant,

Ram Ch. Mazumdar, Rama Prosad Mookerjee and Sisir Kumar Ghosal—for Respondents.

Rankin, J.—In this case the appeal is brought from a decision of the District Judge, 24 Parganas, whereby he decreed a suit for rent. The arguments that have been very ably urged before us for the appellant arise out of the following facts: It appears that at the beginning, the defendant was a lessee of an ordinary non-permanent jote of some 302 bighas at a rental per bigha of Rs. 1-12-0 per annum. In March 1911 the lessee transferred some 55 bighas to a lady of the name of Bhagabati Dasi. That was a transfer; was not a sub-lease, but a complete transfer, as regards 55 bighas, of the defendant's right and interest. It was a transfer which the landlord, the present plaintiff, was not obliged to recognize. It appears, however, that in point of fact the landlord did recognize her and did accept rent from the transferee. On 25th February 1914 the landlord granted a permanent settlement to the defendant and, upon the document containing that permanent settlement, the present questions really arise. The document begins by saying:

Whereas the lessee is in possession under garkaimi or temporary and nontransferable right of a holding of 302 . . . and whereas the said lessee has proposed to take a permanent maurusi mokarari settlement of the same at a rental of Rs. 2-4-0 per bigha, and whereas the landlord has accepted the lessee's proposal this pattah is granted to the lessee on the terms and conditions mentioned below.

It says the selami is Rs. 1. It says the boundaries of the aforesaid land are given in the schedule below. It says the annual rate of rent, and then it goes on by Cl. 7 to say that the company shall have full power to survey or measure the land held by the said lessee by virtue of this lease from time to time and the company shall have full liberty to increase or decrease the rent according as the land is found to be more or less than the area mentioned in this pattah at the abovementioned rate of Rs. 2-4-0 per bigha.

Now, it appears that some three years after the rent of this lease Bhagabati applied for mutation of name in the landlord's sherista and her application was granted. In this suit the defendant was sued for rent from 1322 to 1324 under the pattah of 25th Feb. 1914. The area for which he is sued is limited to the area in his own actual occupation and enjoyment.

In these circumstances he takes two defences before us. First of all that when the pattah of 1914 was given, that comprised the 55 bighas which he had previously transferred to Bhagabati. He says that, as regards this 55 bighas, he has become by his new pattah an intermediate tenure-holder and Bhagabati is obliged to attorn to him. In these circumstances he says that he has a holding of the whole 302 bighas, and that if his landlord sues him for rent for only a part of that holding then that rent suit is not a properly constituted rent suit. In the second place he says that he has never got possession under the new pattah of the 55 bighas transferred to Bhagabati and that the landlord, by granting her prayer for mutation of name, has so interfered with his enjoyment as to amount to an eviction entail-

It will be observed that in this suit the defendant by these defences is really endeavouring to litigate the question which may be of some importance and difficulty and which affects his landlord on one hand and Bhagabati on the other hand—the question, namely, whether under the pattah of 1914 it was ever intended that he should be given maurusi mokarari right in the land which he had previous thereto transferred to somebody else. However, if we are obliged to determine that question in view of the present defence we should have to do so. But, in my opinion, we are not obliged to determine that question; and, apart from determining that question, these two defences should be disallowed.

It is perfectly plain, to take the eviction point first, that this lease was intended on the footing that the lessors were granting to the lessee the land of which he was in possession. He takes that lease on that footing. He wants to turn round now and says:

I did not have possession, you have never given me possession under the lease, of 55 bighas and, therefore, I am not obliged to pay you any rent at all.

On the face of this document, in my opinion, the contention as regards eviction is unsound. If it be the case then, on the execution of that document Bhagabati became obliged in law to attorn to the lessee and to pay her rent to him, and, if she did not do so, the lessee has ample remedy against Bhagabati. But why, because she took one view of her rights in that respect, the landlord should be obliged to suffer an entire suspension of rent for having granted to his lessee a lease intended to give him only a higher right in what he possessed already, I fail altogether to see. I think the decisions with regard to suspension of rent upon eviction are entirely inapplicable, in the circumstances, to this case.

The next question is whether the defendant is entitled to take the technical defence that this suit, as it is not brought for the whole 302 bighas, is in form bad and should be dismissed. A case (Raheemuddy Akan v. Poorno Chander Roy Chowdhury) has been cited from 22 W. R. 336. That is an old case, and I have no doubt at all that it was rightly decided. It was a case where there being some four holdings the landlords had purported to cut up the four holdings so as to make five holdings altogether, interfering with the area held by each individual tenant; and when they brought five rent suits on that footing the whole five suits were dismissed with costs. That seems to me to be very sound and reasonable. But the present case is not a case to which that can, in my opinion, apply. Because, apart from the fact that the land is described inter alia by a reference to the defendants' possession, Cl. 7 says that, at any rate for some consideration, the parties agreed that the company should be at liberty to find out the exact area of which the lessee was to be in occupation and should be entitled to charge him for rent calculated upon that area, be it less or more than the area mentioned in the pattah. I think that Cl. 7 is sufficient answer to this technical objection and for that reason this appeal fails.

I would repeat that in my opinion we are unable to arrive at this result without finally deciding here and now what the exact state of right is as between the plaintiff company on the one hand, Bhagabati on the other and this lessee on the third part.

In my opinion, in any view, the present suit is entitled to succeed and this appeal is dismissed with costs to the plaintiff respondent.

Civil Rule No 946 of 1927, Decided on 16th November 1927, from order of Sub-Judge and Asst. Sub-Judge, Dacca, in T. Suit No. 666 of 1925

Civil P. C., O. 32, R. 7—Compromise on behalf of minor—Court postponing its decision—Compromise not against minor's interests—Permission to withdraw from compromise was refused.

Three plaintiffs, of whom two were minors, sued in ejectment certain defendants. Later the plaintiffs and one of the defendants filed a petition of compromise and a petition by the guardian for leave to compromise under the provisions of O. 32, R. 7, was also put in. The Court put off decision on the compromise petition. Meantime the three plaintiffs by another petition sought to withdraw from the compromise on the ground that there had been misrepresentation and that the guardian of the minors in fact knew nothing about it. The Court found that there was no misrepresentation and that the compromise was not against the minors' interest and gave a decree in terms of the compromise.

Held: that the Court rightly refused permission to withdraw from the compromise as there was no misrepresentation by defendant and the compromise was not against the minor's interest: 22 Mad. 378 and A. I. R. 1925 All. 570, Dist. [P 248 C 1]

Atul Chandra Gupta and Deblal Sen — for Petitioners.

M. A. S. M. Akram — for Opposite Parties.

Judgment.—In this case one Harendra Lal Basak and two minors, represented by their mother, sued in ejectment certain defendants. On 14th June 1926, the plaintiffs and defendant 3 filed a petition of compromise and a petition by the guardian for leave to compromise under the provisions of O. 32, R. 7, Civil P. C., was also put in. By the compromise defendant 3 was to pay a certain nazar and get the tenancy of some of the lands. With the other defendants there was no proposed compromise. The learned Munsif did not then consider the petition of compromise because, as he expressed in his judgment, he wished to be satisfied after hearing the case as to whether it was in the interests of the minors. But on 28th August 1926, the three plaintiffs by another petition sought to withdraw from the compromise on the ground that there had been misrepresentation and that the guardian of the minors in fact knew nothing about it. The Munsif during the trial came to the conclusion that there was no misrepresentation by defendant 3 and he found that the compromise was not against the minors' interests and, therefore, so far as the defendant 3 was concerned he gave a decree in terms of the compromise. The other defendants had apparently admitted the plaintiffs' title and decrees were also made as against them. The appeal came before the Subordinate Judge and was rejected.

A rule was then obtained from this Court and it is urged that no compromise on behalf of the minors could be effected except with leave of the Court and that, therefore, as before the compromise was sanctioned by the Court the guardian who wished to compromise had resiled from it the decree on compromise was illegal at least so far as these minors were concerned. Now, it is argued that, in view of the cases of Ranga Rao v. Rajagopala Raju (1) and Gulab Dei v. Vaish Motor Co. (2), as the petition for compromise had been followed by another petition for leave to withdraw from compromise before the leave was granted, therefore, the Courts were bound not to accept the compromise as regards these two minors. This case, however, is not similar to those cases. In those cases the next friend of a minor agreed to compromise subject to leave of the Court and withdrew before leave was applied for. In the present case, leave was applied for and the Munsif put off deciding whether he should give leave or not until he knew all about the position of the parties. The action of the Munsif I can quite understand. In the present case leave was applied for and the learned Munsif's decision on the later petition and the decision in appeal had been that this later petition asking to withdraw was not a bona fide one. It is to be noted that the petition was not by the minors alone. It is by all three of the parties and is mainly concerned on whether there was misrepresentation to the major plaintiff. It is only in the last sentence of the petition that it is said that the lady guardian knew nothing about it. The learned Munsif has found that this petition was not a bona fide one but was got up by other interested parties owing to other facts in the suit. I cannot, therefore, say that the learned Munsif and the learned Subordinate Judge were wrong though the Munsif may not have acted strictly in accordance with the words of the Code in not granting leave to compromise on the first day. In this view and especially as the rulings I have referred to are not on the same facts as in the present case I am not prepared to exercise jurisdiction under S. 115 of the Code, and the rule is, therefore, discharged with costs. Hearing-fee one gold mohur.

Sasanka Jiban Roy—for Opposite Party.

Judgment.—The petitioner in this case has been convicted of adultery and sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for one month and to pay a fine of Rs. 100 with a further one month's rigorous imprisonment in default of payment.

The case against the petitioner rested on oral and documentary evidence. As regards the oral evidence the learned Chief Presidency Magistrate remarks:

As for the witnesses examined it must be admitted that on their evidence alone it would be difficult to found a conviction.

Then from his judgment it appears that the documentary evidence which had most influence on his decision was a letter Ex. 2. This letter admittedly was written by the complainant's wife. From the terms of that letter it appears that she was writing most affectionately to the accused, and if the letter was really a piece of genuine correspondence between them it would go very far to support a charge of adultery. It appears, however, that this letter was received by the complainant from an anonymous correspondent. There is no evidence that the letter was ever in the possession of the accused or was ever seen by him. This being so we think the learned Magistrate was wrong in treating it as evidence of any value as against the accused. To hold otherwise would put it in the power of any adulterous wife to implicate a third party in order to screen her real lover. The evidence being such as it is we must hold that the conviction was not justified.

We accordingly make this Rule absolute and set aside the conviction of the petitioner and acquit him and direct that the fine if paid be refunded to the petitioner. The petitioner will now be discharged from his bail bond.

Rankin, J.—I think that this appeal must fail. The learned District Judge has made observations in his judgment as to the mistake made by the pleader for the appellant not being bona fide. I do not quite understand that; but my view is, looking at this matter for myself, that what has happened is that from the ordinary point of view the mistake has been made without any real excuse. In these circumstances I am not prepared to hold that there was sufficient cause under S. 5, Limitation Act. I would be very much against laying down a wide and general rule as to the construction of S. 5. I think the discretion of the Court has to be exercised on all the facts in each particular case. With regard to the question whether the learned Judge of the Court of appeal below exercised a discretion entirely free from notice as to negligence and as to bona fides which might interrupt a fair consideration of the matter. I am not quite sure, but I think that he came to a right conclusion and, therefore, we ought not to interfere with his decision. The appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Judgment.—This is an appeal from the District Judge of Tipperah who confirmed an order of the Subordinate Judge of Comilla. The point that arises in the appeal is whether the learned Judge in the Court below was right in the conclusion to which he came: that there could be a valid reference to arbitration in a suit unless all the parties to the suit joined in asking for the reference. The learned District Judge has held that there could be a valid reference to arbitration without all the parties to the suit agreeing to the reference. In our opinion this decision is clearly wrong as S. 1, Sch. 2, Civil P. C., by virtue of which a reference of matter in dispute in a suit can be made, expressly provides for all the parties to the suit agreeing to the reference.

The result is that the decision of the District Judge is, as already stated, wrong as also the decision of the Subordinate Judge which it affirms. In our opinion there was no valid reference to arbitration and the appeal must succeed and the suit must proceed. A question was raised with regard to the form in which this appeal was filed. The appeal is directed against the judgment and decree passed by the District Judge. This is quite correct, but it is headed as an appeal from an appellate order and the proper Court-fee in respect of the appeal against the decree has not been paid nor have certified copies of the decrees of both the Courts below been filed. But these are matters which can be cured and the appeal itself was properly preferred against the judgment and decree, and accordingly there is nothing in the preliminary objection that was taken as the learned vakil for the appellant undertakes to put in within one week the deficit Court-fee and file certified copies of the decrees.

Subject to this undertaking the appeal, therefore, succeeds with costs, hearing-fee, two gold mohurs. Liberty to apply if the undertaking is not carried out.

Mookerjee, J—This is an appeal by the plaintiff in a declaratory suit.

The subject-matter of the litigation originally belonged to one Digambar Das who made a testamentary disposition on the day of his death, which took place on the 5th July 1888. He left two widows Bindubashini and Birajmohini and two sons, one by each wife namely, Annada Prosad by his first wife Bindubashini; and Ambika Prosad by his second wife Biraj Mohini. In the litigation Annada is the plaintiff and Ambika is a defendant.

The will was proved in due course and in 1893 a suit was instituted by Annada Prosad on the original side of this Court for construction of the will and for partition of the estate. The preliminary decree was made on the 25th June 1894. The commissioner submitted his report on 13th August 1898, which was confirmed on the 7th September 1898.

It appears that Annada Prosad had in the meantime mortgaged his interest in the estate of his father, with the result that his right, title and interest was brought to sale in execution of a decree made in the original side of this Court. On 8th July 1899, Prince Qamar Quadir, of the family of the King of Oudh, purchased the property now in suit, and on 14th December 1917, defendant 1 took a conveyance of the property from him. On 9th August 1918 the plaintiff instituted the present suit for declaration that at the time of the conveyance in favour of defendant 1 by the execution purchaser, there was no subsisting interest which could be transferred, inasmuch as the interest acquired by him had been extinguished by adverse possession. The Subordinate Judge has decreed the suit.

The property in dispute is a house which was assigned to the mother of the plaintiff under the decree made in the suit for construction of the will and for partition of the estate. The relevant clause of the will is in these terms:

It is further declared that my elder wife shall have right of residence for the term of her natural life in the three-storeyed portion and my younger wife in the two-storeyed portion of my house No. 35, Ram Kamal Mookerjee Street. I direct my executor to pay into the hands of Shama Charan Bose the sum of Rs. 3,000 to complete the unfinished portion of the three-storeyed portion of my said house No. 35, Ram Kamal Mookerjee Street.

In the decree made on 25th June 1894 it was declared that subject to the right of residence of Sreemutty Bindubashini Dassi, the mother of the plaintiff, and Sreemutty Birajmohini Dassi, the mother of defendant 1, and subject to provision being made for the legacies, annuities and bequests made by the said will, the plaintiff is entitled to a moiety or one equal half part of share of the said testator's estate, and that, subject as aforesaid, the defendant Ambika Prosad is entitled to the other moiety or remaining one equal half part or share thereof. The report of the commissioner made on 13th August 1898, stated that the three storeyed or eastern portion of the house had been set apart for the elder widow and the two-storied portion for the junior widow for the purpose of residence during the terms of their natural lives. The report further stated that subject to the right of residence of the widows in the portions mentioned in the map annexed, the remainder of the property had vested in the sons as directed by the will. This was confirmed by the decree of Court made on 7th September 1898. The right, title and interest of the plaintiff was thereafter sold in execution of the mortgage decree on 8th July 1899 and became vested in the prince. The sale certificate, which shows that the sale was duly confirmed, makes it clear that what was sold was the right, title and interest of the mortgagor, subject to the right of residence of his mother during her life. The position, consequently, was that the execution purchaser acquired the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor subject to the right of residence of the lady.

It is now urged on behalf of the plaintiff that it was incumbent upon the auction-purchaser to obtain delivery of possession and that inasmuch as he did not take steps in that behalf, the title he had acquired was extinguished by lapse of time. This view has commended itself to the Subordinate Judge and he has given the plaintiff a declaration that at the time when the prince executed the conveyance in favour of defendant 1 he had no subsisting interest in the property to transfer. We are of opinion that this view cannot possibly be sustained.

It is a well-settled rule of construction that where words describing an interest refer only to right of possession personal to the donee, prima facie, life-interest only is created. In support of this proposition Sir Asutosh Chaudhury has relied upon the principle enunciated by the House of Lords in Coward v. Larkman (1), which affirmed the judgment of the Court of appeal in Coward v. Larkman (2), modifying the decision of Mr Justice Kay in Coward v. Larkman (3). In that case the testator gave his wife free use and occupation of a house. Lord Halsbury held that, as this gave the widow the free use and occupation of a house in words unqualified and unlimited in time, there was an absolute gift in favour of the widow. In his opinion, this fell within the well-known rule that, if you give the income of real or personal estate, and the gift of the income is absolute and unlimited, the corpus is included in the gift or, as is figuratively put, the gift of the fruit in an unqualified and absolute manner is a perpetual gift of the tree. This principle is embodied in S 159, Succession Act. Lord Watson did not dissent from the view that a gift for use and occupation was governed by the same rule as a bequest of rent and profits. But he held that the terms of the will before them, if taken as a whole, afforded sufficient indication of the intention of the testator to restrict the interest of the widow in the residence for the period of her life. In the case before us no question arises as to whether the widow took an interest for life or in perpetuity, because, in the suit for construction of the will, it has been held that the widow had only a personal right of residence during her life. The position thus is that, subject to such interest, the residue is in the son. Consequently the principle enunciated by the Judicial Committee in Kewan Pershad v. Mt Radha Beeby (4) becomes applicable. Dr. Lushington pointed out that where, by a testamentary instrument the testator gave his wife a life-estate and, subject thereto, an interest in favour of his brother and nephew, the latter took a vested interest though the actual enjoyment of the expectant interest was postponed till the termination of the life. In the present case the plaintiff took a vested interest subject to the right of residence granted in favour of his mother by his father's will. He had no immediate right of possession which remained with his mother during her lifetime. The purchaser of the right, title and interest of the plaintiff was in no better position. The purchase he made was expressly subject to the right of residence of the widow. It would accordingly have been futile for him to make an application to the Court for delivery of possession.

It has been next contended on behalf of the respondent that the auction-purchaser might have obtained what is called symbolical possession. The Code no doubt distinguishes between symbolical possession and actual possession. Symbolical possession is delivered where the property is in the occupation of a person, such as a tenant, who is entitled to remain in occupation, notwithstanding the sale of the superior interest. Actual possession is delivered where the property is in the occupation of a person whose interest has been sold by the decree of the Court. In the case before us, the Court could not have delivered symbolical possession, because under the certificate the possession was bound to remain with the lady and the purchaser was not entitled to possession till that right had terminated in accordance with the terms of the will. In these circumstances there could be no room for adverse possession. The doctrine of adverse possession is applied to the detriment of a person who is entitled to possession but is not in possession; it cannot be applied as against a person not competent to claim possession. Illustrations of this fundamental rule may be found in various classes of cases. See, for instance, Priyasakhi v. Bireswar (5) (dispossession of mortgagor), Womesh v. Raj Narayan (6) (dispossession of tenant). We are consequently of opinion that as the execution purchaser could not obtain possession of the property he had acquired, there could be no adverse possession as against him.

We have been finally pressed to hold that, as the plaintiff occupied the house jointly with his mother, his possession must be deemed adverse to that of the auction-purchaser. There is clearly no force in this contention. His occupation was obviously by leave and license of his mother, and was in no sense adverse to her. But, even if there had been such adverse possession, it could not have affected the auction-purchaser who had purchased subject to the right of residence of the widow herself.

The Subordinate Judge, we observe, has held that, as the possession of the plaintiff was adequate in continuity and publicity, it must be taken to be adverse. He has clearly misapplied the principle of the decision of the Judicial Committee in Radhamani Debi v. Collector of Khulna (7). Lord Robertson pointed out that possession, when adverse, in order that it may extinguish title, must be adequate in continuity, in publicity and in extent. But it does not follow conversely that every possession which is continuous and public is necessarily adverse. In this connexion reference may be made to the decision of the Judicial Committee in the case of Raja Mohamed Montaz Ali Khan v. Mohan Singh (8), where Lord Salvesen discussed the elements requisite for possession to be adverse in character, and pointed out that mere assertion of adverse title does not transform permissive or fiduciary possession into adverse possession. We are consequently of opinion that in the case before us the possession of the plaintiff, such as it was, was not adverse possession as against the purchaser and did not affect his title, which passed by the sale to the execution purchaser. The plaintiff entirely failed to prove that he has re-acquired a fresh title by adverse possession as against the purchaser or his transferee.

The result is that this appeal is allowed, the decree of the Subordinate Judge set aside and the suit dismissed with costs both here and in the Court below.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit for a declaration of the plaintiffs' title as mutwallis to certain waqf and also for other reliefs.

The Court of first instance gave a decree to the plaintiffs. On appeal that decree was reversed and the plaintiffs have appealed to this Court.

The Court of appeal below found that the waqf was a collusive paper transaction intended to keep the properties covered by the waqfnama safe from the claims of any possible future creditor or other claims of other persons and that it is clear that the disputed property was never treated as waqf property and it was treated as secular property of Kamarali Patari and after his death it descended to his heirs as secular property and treated by them as secular property.

The learned Judge, in the concluding portion of his judgment observes as follows:

There can be no doubt that the wakfnama created by Kamarali Patari was a sham colourable transaction and it was not intended to be acted upon and it was not given effect to by Kamar Ali or by plaintiffs and they all treated the properties covered by the deed of waqf as their secular properties and enjoyed them as such and not for the upkeep and maintenance of the mosque.

It is contended by the learned vakil for the appellants that under the Mahomadan law it is not open to any person to impugn the validity of a waqfnama once it is executed and registered, provided that it purports to be an absolute dedication. The learned vakil has relied upon the head-notes in the judgment in the case of Kulsom Bibi v. Golam Hossein Cassim Ariff (1), where it is stated that in a suit for setting aside a waqfnama on the ground that the trusts are illusory and that there has been no substantial dedication to religious and charitable trusts, the question before the Court is whether there was a real intention to give effect to the document as a waqfnama. The intention of the settlor must be gathered from the document itself. If the waqf was formally constituted and perfected and established by its terms a substantial charitable trust it is wholly immaterial whether its provisions were carried out or not, for that is a matter of breach of trust only. Evidence given to show that it was never intended to give effect to the trusts and that in fact they were not given effect to is irrelevant in such a suit. Evidence, however, showing the manner in which the document is related to existing facts, e. g., the value and state of the waqf properties, is relevant.

These general statements, however, should be considered along with the facts of the case. It appears that these observations were made in that case with reference to a person who was claiming under the settlor. At p. 484, the learned Judge (Woodroffe, J.,) observes:

Nor in the present case can the evidence be said to be admissible for the purpose of invalidating the documents, for if a waqf executed with the necessary formalities and otherwise validly constituted establishes by its terms a substantial trust in favour of the public, it is not open to the settlor or those claiming under him to say that though the document by its terms evidences an intention to make a trust, he the settlor never intended to carry it out and in fact never did so. So here there is no dispute that the documents were executed and registered and I find that if possession is necessary it was given. If that document creates a trust in favour of the public and if (point to which I will next deal) that trust is the primary object of the settlor and is of a substantial character it appears to be quite beyond the powers of the settlor or those claiming under him to say: "I have said I have made a trust, but I never intended one and thus to wrest from a third party, the public, the benefit which by the express terms of his deed he has bestowed on them. In my opinion, therefore, the evidence given to show that it was never intended to give effect to the trusts and that in fact they were not given effect to is in this case irrelevant. The intention of the settlor must be gathered from the documents themselves.

The observation, therefore, has reference to a case between the trusts and the settlor or persons claiming under him, and in such a case no evidence is admissible to prove that it was not intended to be acted upon and the question of intention is to be determined, not upon any extraneous evidence, but upon the intentions as appearing from the document itself. In the case of Hazi Mahamed Nagor v. Abdul Jalil the learned Judges observe that these waqfs have been created by documents, and it seems to us that the language employed in them is not ambiguous. The documents in terms establish religious and charitable trusts and evidence is not, therefore, admissible to show that the settlor had no intention to give effect to the trusts or that the trusts were not in fact given effect to. That was decided in the case of Kulsom Bibi v. Golam Hossain Cassim Ariff (1).

In that case also it was the brother of the settlor who was impugning the validity of the waqf. We have not been referred to any authority where it is laid down that a person who does not claim through the settlor is not entitled by reason of any rule of Mahomedan law to challenge the validity of a waqf on the ground that it was merely an illusory transaction and was never intended to be acted upon. In the present case we have seen that the finding of the learned Judge was that the waqf was a collusive paper transaction intended to keep the properties covered by the waqfnama safe from the claims of any possible future creditor or other claims of other persons.

The defendants in the present case are purchasers of some portion of the properties at a sale for arrears of Government revenue. They do not claim in any way under the settlor. The learned pleader for the respondents has referred to the case of Mulla Veettil Ussain v. Subramania Aiyar (2), where the learned Judges referred to the case of Kulsom Bibi v. Golam Hossain Cassim Ariff (1) and observed:

With all respect we think that those observations are too broadly expressed. In cases where the question is whether there has been a real dedication, the production of a registered instrument in writing making a transfer of the property would no doubt be strong prima facie evidence of such dedication. But we think it is competent to parties interested in the matter to prove that the instrument was merely nominal and that in fact there was no real dedication.

We do not think that there is anything in the Mahomedan law which permits a Mahomedan to defeat his creditors merely by executing and registering a waqfnama although he never intends to give effect to it as a waqf.

It appears that the defendants purchased the zamindari within which the alleged waqf property is held as a tenure. The defendants after purchasing the zamindari at a sale held under Act 11 of 1859, brought a suit for annulment of the tenure and obtained a decree for possession against the present plaintiffs 1 and 2. The suit, however, was instituted against them in their personal capacity and not as mutwallis. The suit was decided ex parte. Plaintiff 2 got the ex parte decree set aside and the suit was re-heard. It appears that plaintiff 2 claimed the property as his own having received it in exchange from his brother, plaintiff 1. That suit was again decreed against plaintiff 2 and in execution of the decree for costs some of the properties were sold and purchased by the present defendants. Plaintiff 2 preferred a claim which was disallowed and an application for revision was rejected by the High Court. The present suit was instituted more than a year after the order disallowing the claim, but within one year from the date on which the application for revision was rejected by the High Court. A question was raised whether the suit was not barred under Art. 11, Lim. Act. In the view, however, we have taken of the other question it is unnecessary to consider the point.

The appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Civil Rule No 958 of 1927, Decided on 1st December 1927, from order of Dist. Judge, Faridpur, D/- 21st May 1927.

Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 153—No declaration as to amount of rent in the decree — Question as to amount annually payable by tenant actually decided—Exception to S. 153 applies and the order is appealable.

Having regard to the wording of the exception to S. 153, no declaration in the order or in the decree as to the amount of rent that is annually payable by the tenant to the landlord in respect of the jama, is necessary and a case comes within the exception contained in S. 153, even though there is no such declaration in the decree or order if a question as to the amount annually payable has been decided in the de-decree or order, and an appeal lies from the decision. [P 255 C 2]

Nirmal Chandra Chakravarti — for Petitioner.

Nurudddin Ahmed—for Opposite Party.

Judgment.—This rule relates to a suit for rent which was tried by the Munsif, Second Court, Madaripur. The suit was valued at Rs. 15 odd. The Munsif decreed the suit. The defendant preferred an appeal to the District Judge and the learned Judge held that the appeal was not maintainable in view of the provisions of S. 153, Ben. Ten. Act. He held that the trial Court could not be considered to have decided any question of the amount of rent annually payable. The rule has been issued to show cause why this order of the learned District Judge should not be set aside upon the grounds first, that the decision of the learned Munsif having decided a question of the amount of rent annually payable, the learned Judge ought to have held that he had jurisdiction to hear the appeal, that the Court of appeal below ought to have held that the Court of first instance has also decided a question of title to or interest in 12 acres of land between the plaintiff and the defendants in this case and, therefore, the appeal was competent.

So far as the second of these grounds is concerned, I may say at once that I do not feel pressed by the argument advanced in support of it. As regards the first ground the position seems to be different. The facts relevant for the purposes of that ground are these: The plaintiff claimed rent in respect of this tenancy alleging that it comprised an area of 41 acres and bore a rental of Rs. 3 per year. His case was that originally the jama consisted of 53 acres of land and the rental was Rs. 4, but that afterwards 12 or 13 acres of land were taken out of this jama for digging a tank thereon and the plaintiff paid Rs. 30 for the said quantity that was thus taken; and further that on account of this reduction in the area of the jama the rental was reduced by Re. 1. The defendant's case on the other hand, appears to have been that the area of the jama was 53 and that the rental was Rs. 4 as is evidenced by the settlement khatian, Ex. 4-A. The defendant, besides setting up various other defences, also contended that there ought to be a total suspension of rent inasmuch as he had been dispossessed from a portion of the lands of the jama. The questions which had necessarily to be determined, amongst others, in order to dispose of this suit were: whether the relationship of landlord and tenant existed between the parties, whether the plaintiff's allegation that the original jama of Rs. 4 was reduced to Rs. 3 in consequence of a portion of the lands of the jama having been taken by the plaintiff for digging a tank and whether the rent at the aforesaid rate, as was alleged on behalf of the plaintiff, was due from the defendant or not. Without determining the question whether the jama bore a rental of Rs. 3, as was the case put forward on behalf of the plaintiff, or it bore a rental of Rs. 4 and consisted of additional lands in which case the plaintiff perhaps would not have been entitled to a decree, no decision could be arrived at on the merits of the plaintiff's claim. It is true that there is no declaration in the order or in the decree as to amount of rent that is annually payable by the defendant to the plaintiff in respect of the jama. But having regard to the wording of the exception contained in S. 153 it does not appear that any such declaration is necessary in order to bring the case within the exception. It is sufficient if a question as to the amount annually payable has been decided in the decree or order. It certainly appears from the judgment that there has been a decision as regards the amount of the jama payable in respect of this tenancy. The only difference between this case and cases of the type that ordinarily come up before the Courts is that in the latter class of cases the jama alleged on behalf of the plaintiff is more than what is alleged on behalf of the defendant and in this particular case the position is reversed on account of its peculiar circumstances. The fact, however, remains that the question of the amount of rent annually payable has been decided. In this view of the matter I am of opinion that an appeal lay from the decision of the learned Munsif.

The rule is accordingly made absolute, the decision of the learned District Judge is set aside and it is directed that the appeal which the petitioner had filed in the Court of the learned District Judge from the decision of the Munsif be now heard and dealt with in accordance with law.

Costs of this rule, one gold mohur, will abide the result of the appeal.

S. C. Basak and Surendra Nath Das Gupta—for Appellant.

B. L. Mitter, S. N. Bannerjee and Bhagirath Ch. Das—for Respondents.

Mukerji, J.—This appeal has been preferred from certain orders passed by the Subordinate Judge, First Court, Backergunge, on 17th February, 26th February and 1st March 1927, by which the learned Judge appointed a receiver in respect of properties which form the subject-matter of a suit now pending in his Court.

It is necessary, in order to deal with the contentions that have been urged on behalf of the appellant in this appeal, to set out a few facts. One Babu Raj Chandra Roy Chowdhury died leaving three sons and two daughters. For the purposes of this appeal we are concerned with one of his sons, namely, Babu Behary Lal Roy Chowdhury, and the two daughters named Adya Sundari and Bidya Sundari. Plaintiffs 1 and 2 are two of the sons of Babu Behary Lal Roy Chowdhury and defendant 1 is another son and the plaintiffs 3 and 4 are the sons of a daughter of a predeceased son of the said Babu Behary Lal Roy Chowdhury. Defendant 2 is Bidya Sundari herself and defendant 3 is a daughter of Adya Sundari. Behari Lal died on 10th March 1917 leaving considerable properties. He left a will which was executed shortly before his death. By this will he had made provisions for paying off certain debts, had given directions as to certain bequests and monthly legacies, enjoined the erection of two temples, made arrangements for certain pujas and ultimately left the properties moveable and immovable to plaintiffs 1 and 2 and defendant 1. Defendant 1 was appointed executor under the will. In 1918 defendant 1 applied for probate. This application was resisted by plaintiffs 1 and 2, and an administrator pendente lite was appointed in the course of those proceedings. Ultimately a compromise was reached between the parties in which certain terms were agreed upon and were filed in Court. Of these terms it is necessary only to refer to those that are contained in paras 1, 7, 8 and 9 of the terms of settlement. Para 1 states :

Caveats entered by Sushil Kumar Roy and Jatindra Kumar Roy (plaintiffs 1 and 2) are to be withdrawn and probate of the will to be granted to Surendra Kumar Roy (defendant 1) on his proving the will in solemn form, and thereupon the administrator pendente lite is to be discharged.

Para. 7 states :

Until the debts have been paid off and provision made for payment of legacies and construction of mundirs as provided by Cl. 5 hereof the estate will be managed by Surendra Kumar Roy in consultation with Sushil Kumar Roy and Jatindra Kumar Roy or their respective agents authorized in their behalf by a power-of-attorney.

Para. 8 runs thus :

After the debts have been paid and provisions have been made for payment of the legacies the estate will be divided equally between the three brothers Sushil Kumar Roy, Jatindra Kumar Roy and Surendra Kumar Roy, and each will be entitled to collect his share of the rents from the zamindari properties separately and to deal with his own share.

Para. 9 runs in these words :

Babu Surendra Kumar Roy will be at liberty to go to the mofussil accompanied by an officer of the estate to be nominated by Jatindra and ushil, and all collections made by him on account of nazar (voluntary donation) should be spent by him for feeding Brahmans and other people at Barisal for the spiritual benefit of the testator and on rendering an account in that behalf.

On these terms being filed the will was proved in solemn form : the caveat was withdrawn, a decree was passed on 30th August 1918, and in accordance therewith the defendant 1 obtained probate on 19th June 1919.

The present action which has given rise to the proceedings out of which this appeal has arisen was commenced on 28th October 1925. Essentially, it is a suit for ascertainment of the estate left by the testator Behary Lal, for the due administration thereof, for partition, for taking accounts from defendant 1 in respect of his dealings in connexion with the estate, for recovery of the moneys, papers, etc., due from him and for other reliefs. There is also a prayer, amongst the prayers in the plaint, for the appointment of a receiver. As regards this prayer the learned Subordinate Judge first of all made an order on 3rd November 1925 that necessary orders would be passed on the plaintiffs' filing an affidavit within three days. Thereafter affidavits, counter-affidavits and affidavits in reply were filed on behalf of the parties and arguments were heard on the question of the appointment of the receiver on several days till 10th December 1925. On 11th December 1925 a petition was filed on behalf of plaintiffs 1 and 2 and defendant 1, asking that the suit might be referred to an arbitrator. On 15th December 1925, defendants 2 and 3 appeared and by a separate petition made a prayer for a reference of the case to an arbitrator. On 17th December 1925 plaintiffs 3 and 4 appeared and also prayed for a reference to an arbitration. In accordance with these prayers, on 21st December 1925, the learned Subordinate Judge appointed Rai Bepin Chandra Das Gupta Bahadur, a retired Subordinate Judge, an arbitrator to decide the suit in the terms of the petitions that had been filed.

It may be stated here that the task which this gentleman has undertaken is purely a matter of love, and it is gratifying to note that as regards his conduct in connexion with the arbitration proceedings nothing has been said on behalf of any of the parties before us. It would be tedious to set out the various proceedings that took place before the arbitrator. It is sufficient to say that there has been some delay, either intentional or unavoidable, on the part of defendant 1 to produce the papers that the arbitrator wanted, and in consequence of this delay applications had from time to time to be filed before the Court, reports had to be submitted by the arbitrator to the Court and orders had also frequently to be passed against defendant 1 for the production of the said papers. On the 25th June 1926, plaintiff 1 filed a petition in Court supported by an affidavit for the appointment of a receiver. Thereafter again heaps of affidavits, counter-affidavits and affidavits in reply were filed on behalf of different parties. Various charges were made on behalf of plaintiff 1 stating that defendant 1 was causing delay in the matter of the arbitration proceedings, had taken up an obstructive attitude with reference thereto, and that he had been guilty of negligence, misappropriation of funds, fraud, fabrication of accounts and things of that sort.

For our present purposes we do not propose to go into all these in detail. The arbitrator was asked by the Court to submit his report with regard to this application for the appointment of a receiver. On the 6th December 1926, the arbitrator submitted a report ; just the sort of report that we should have expected from him when he had not yet finished his enquiry with regard to the accounts. In this report he stated that there was undoubtedly delay on the part of defendant 1 in the matter of submission of account papers and in spite of repeated orders and verbal request the papers had not been filed in time. As regards the charge that bejabeda collection had been made by defendant 1, the arbitrator stated that no definite conclusion could be arrived at with regard to this matter without a local enquiry. He stated that defendant 1 and his pleaders had assured him that there would be no delay in future with regard to the submission of the account papers. As regards misappropriation he stated that it was premature to pass any opinion on that point before the accounts were examined, and as regards other charges also he was not able nor willing to pronounce any definite opinion. Thereafter we find some further affidavits were filed on behalf of the parties and ultimately, on the 17th February 1927, the learned Judge made an order appointing a receiver in respect of the properties which formed the subject-matter of the suit. In pursuance of this order one Babu Rash Behary Chowdhury was subsequently appointed as such receiver on the 26th February 1927, and he having furnished the security bond on the 1st March 1927, a writ was issued in his favour. From these orders the present appeal has been preferred on behalf of defendant 1.

The contentions that have been urged on behalf of the appellant are five in number. To put them as nearly in the words of the learned advocate for the appellant as possible they are: first, that the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the application for the appointment of a receiver after having referred the whole dispute to arbitration in accordance with the prayer of all the parties; second, that no case has been made out for appointment of a receiver at this stage of the proceedings when the arbitration is being proceeded with; third, that in any view of the case no sufficient grounds have been made out for appointing a receiver which will have the effect of removing defendant 1 from his office as executor acting under the will of the deceased testator; fourth, that assuming a proper case has been made out an outsider should not be appointed as receiver; and fifth, that if an outsider is to be appointed the present incumbent is not a fit and proper person who should be appointed as such.

As regards the first contention reference has been made on behalf of the appellant to Sch. 2, para. 3, Civil P. C., and to the prayer that is in the plaint for the appointment of a receiver, to the order sheet in the suit as showing that arguments on the application for the appointment of a receiver had been heard in part at the time when the reference was made, and to the terms of the petition which, it has been contended, go to show that all matters arising out of the suit had been referred to the arbitrator for decision and disposal. On behalf of the respondents this argument has been sought to be met by the technical plea that there has been no order extending the time within which the award is to be submitted by the arbitrator, and that the arbitrator is now dealing with the matter as a commissioner and not as an arbitrator and that, therefore, the Court had ample jurisdiction to deal with the question of appointment of a receiver. This objection of the respondents in my opinion cannot be allowed to prevail in view of para. 8, Sch. 2, Civil P. C., which enables the Court to enlarge the period fixed for the completion of the award even after it has expired, and also in view of the fact that there is really nothing to indicate that the arbitrator is not still acting as such. The appellant's contention also, on the other hand, does not appear to me to be well founded. There is authority for the proposition that where on account of the arbitration clause in a partnership agreement or lease or the like, by which the parties agreed to refer all their disputes to arbitration, the Court stays proceedings pending before itself, it retains jurisdiction to deal with a prayer for injunction or for a receiver: Law v. Garret (1); Compagnie du Senegal v. Woods (2); Hasky v. Windham (3); and Piri v. Roncoroni (4). In the case of Willesford v. Watson (5), Lord Selborne expressed the view that, if since the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act, parties chose to determine for themselves that they will have a forum of their own selection instead of resorting to the ordinary Courts, a prima facie duty is cast upon the Courts to act upon such arrangement. That the plaintiff's right to a receiver and injunction is not a matter to refer can hardly be disputed. As regards injunction, there is clear authority, see Willesford v. Watson (5), where Lord Selborne says:

It is said that the arbitrator could not grant an injunction. No doubt he could not grant an injunction; but he might say that the thing was not to be done and there being liberty to apply to this Court, this Court would then grant the injunction.

As regards receiver the appointment of a receiver made by an arbitrator will not only be difficult of being enforced as between the parties themselves but would be utterly ineffectual as regards third parties. Of course, it is open to the arbitrator to say that some person should be put in charge or management of the properties, and the Court may then proceed to make the order appointing a receiver. There may be cases where the parties having agreed to refer all their disputes to arbitration the Court may wait until the questions arising in the action are decided by the arbitrator and then consider whether the prayer for receiver should be granted or not as was pointed out in Zalinoff v. Hammond (6). It being the duty of the Court to act upon the agreement entered into by the parties themselves it will have to be ascertained in each individual case as to what was actually referred. If the Court finds that the question of management interim was also referred it may defer the consideration of the question of appointment of a receiver in the view that the parties by agreement between themselves have disentitled themselves to the auxiliary relief which otherwise they could have from the Court. In the petition for reference the words used are :

to do all works in connexion with the subject-matter of the suit and to decide the suit.

These words, in our opinion, do not include the passing of orders for interim protection. We are accordingly of opinion that the appellant's first contention cannot be allowed to prevail.

The second and the third contentions may be taken up together. We have been addressed at great length and in detail on behalf of the parties upon the various charges that have been made or sought to be refuted. We purposely refrain from expressing any opinion on these charges. We are of opinion that the findings of the Subordinate Judge on these charges are not to be taken as being approved of by us. We do not blame the learned Judge for having recorded these findings as we can realize how unhappy his position must have been when he was invited to arrive at his conclusions on these charges, and how helpless he must have felt when much against his will he had to deal with them at a stage at which they could not be dealt with with any degree of satisfaction. It was only affidavit evidence that was before him, and the charges relate to questions of accounting on which the arbitrator has to pronounce the final opinion. Judging from the arguments that have been advanced before us we can form some idea of the acrimonious nature of the instructions which the learned advocates had from their clients, and we feel as unhappy on hearing the arguments as the learned Judge must have felt. We consider it wholly unnecessary to go into these matters and we desire to repeat and emphasize the warning which the learned Judge has given to the arbitrator not to pay any heed to his findings on these charges. We are sure, knowing as we do who the arbitrator is, that he will proceed strictly on his own view in respect of these charges. The appellant undoubtedly is an executor who is till now acting under the probate and in so far as the question arises as to whether a receiver should be appointed which, if done, will have the effect of removing him from the management of the estate, the principles laid down by Woods, J., in the well-known case of Haines v. Carpenter, quoted at length in the footnote to para. 707 of High on Receivers will apply :

A strong case must be made out to induce the Court to dispossess a trustee or executor who is willing to act :

See also Woodroffe on Receiver, 2nd Ed. (pp. 144—146). The position of the appellant, however, is somewhat different from that of an ordinary executor. Under the terms of settlement to which I have referred he was to act in consultation with plaintiffs 1 and 2. That was the condition on which the contest in the probate proceedings was withdrawn. That condition has now become impossible. This, in our opinion, is sufficient in the circumstances of the present case to justify the appointment of receiver. Plaintiffs 1 and 2 are interested in two-thirds share of the properties which would be left after the legacies are paid and the other directions in the will are carried out, and their case is that the appellant is delaying the administration in order to keep the properties in his hands as long as possible. To a certain extent and in a certain sense the appellant occupies a position adverse to plaintiffs 1 and 2 and the case bears some analogy to the one cited in High on Receivers, 4th Edn. p. 869, para. 719. Nearly ten years have elapsed since the testator's death, and it cannot be said that the testator intended that the partition of the properties would be so long delayed The administration in any event has not been a successful one. This, in our opinion, is sufficient to justify the order which has been made.

As regards the fourth contention, we have done our best to induce the respondents to nominate one of them as a joint receiver with the appellant, but we are sorry to note that we have failed. In the circumstances an outsider must necessarily have to be appointed. The fifth contention has no substance. The appellant took no part in the selection of the receiver though asked by the learned Judge. There is really nothing that can be urged against the gentleman who has been appointed. The comment that has been made as regards the hurry with which the receiver entered into possession is not deserved as the real reason why he asked to be put immediately in possession was that the date for the payment of Government revenue was near at hand.

The appeal accordingly fails and must be dismissed with costs, hearing-fee being assessed at 6 (six) gold mohurs to be divided between the two sets of respondents, viz., plaintiff 1 and plaintiffs 2, 3 and 4. The receiver will get his costs from out of the estate.

It is necessary now to give some further directions to the receiver in connexion with this case. We understand that defendant 1 had paid the sum of Rs. 6,587-10-11 in accordance with our order passed on the 17th March 1927. It was understood, when this order was made by us, that the payment which the appellant would make of the Government revenue in accordance with this order would be in the nature of an advance to the estate. The receiver will now proceed to make the collections in the estate and out of the moneys that he will be able to collect he will, as early as possible, pay back to the appellant the said sum of Rs. 6,587-10-11 which the appellant has advanced. If it be not possible for the receiver to pay back the said amount to the appellant within a reasonable time, say within two months from to-day, he will be at liberty to borrow the amount on such advantageous terms as to interest as may be sanctioned by the learned Subordinate Judge. The amount aforesaid will have to be paid to the appellant within that time.

Before parting with the case we should like to make a further direction. That is in connexion with the paper-book that has been prepared in this appeal. It has been prepared in the office of Babu Surendra Nath Das Gupta, The learned vakil had very little time at his disposal for preparing the type-written paper-book. It has been done in such a way as deserves our commendation. There are very few mistakes and the papers have all been well arranged. We are told the Court office had nothing whatsoever to do with the preparation of this paper-book. If so any amount that has been deposited for work to be done by the Court office, but has not been so done, will now be returned to the learned vakil.

Judgment.—The appellant was unanimously found guilty by the jury of offences under Ss. 147 and 325, I. P. C.; and he has been sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for two years and a fine of Rs. 100, and in default to further rigorous imprisonment for two months. The ground on which this appeal must succeed is that the learned Judge who tried the case did not give the appellant an opportunity of cross-examining a certain witness named Abbas with reference to statements made by that witness during the investigation by the police. The learned Judge has recorded in his order that the statements of this witness were recorded by the police under S. 172, Criminal P. C. That section does not provide for the recording of statements of witnesses. Any statements of witnesses that are recorded, in whatever form those statements may be recorded, are recorded under S. 161, Criminal P. C., and the defence have the right to ask for a copy of such statements and to use the statements for the purpose of contradicting the witnesses for the prosecution. How far the statements made by this Abbas would be material it is impossible to say, but it is quite conceivable that the defence may have refrained from making use of the other portions of the diary thinking that having once been refused they would be refused again.

For these reasons we allow this appeal and set aside the conviction and sentence and order that the case be retried with a fresh jury.

The appellant who is on bail will remain on his present bail until further orders of the Sessions Judge.

The provisions of S. 514 indicate that two steps are to be taken, first, it must be proved to the satisfaction of the Court that the bond has been forfeited, whereupon the Court is to record the grounds of such proof; secondly, the Court, on being satisfied as aforesaid, may call upon the person bound by such bond to pay the penalty thereof, or to show cause why it should not be paid. Debendra Narain Bhattacharjee—for Petitioners.

Sanderson, C. J.—This Rule was issued by two of my learned brothers, calling upon the District Magistrate to show cause why the order passed should not be set aside on the first and second grounds stated in the petition.

The order referred to was dated the 9th April 1924, and was made by the learned Sessions Judge of Dacca, by which he forfeited the bail bond of the two petitioners, and directed the Sub-Divisional Magistrate to levy the amount due from the two sureties.

It appears that, on the 26th September 1923, one Ramizuddi was ordered by the Sub-Divisional Officer of Munshiganj to execute a security bond of Rs. 300 with two sureties of Rs. 300 each, to be of good behaviour for a period of two years in a proceeding under S. 110, Civil P. C. The record was forwarded to the learned Sessions Judge; and, in the meantime the Sub-Divisional Officer ordered that Ramizuddi should be detained in prison. On 4th October 1923, an application was made to the learned Judge for the release of Ramizuddi on bail: and, on 8th October 1923, the learned Judge made an order releasing Ramizuddi on his own bail of Rs. 200 with two sureties of Rs. 200 each; the surety bond was signed by the two petitioners who are mukhtars. The form of the bond which was executed was as follows:

We the undersigned sureties do hereby execute the surety bond and promise that we shall produce the accused in the above-mentioned case at the Sessions Court at Dacca whenever called upon to do so; and in default, we bind ourselves to forfeit to His Majesty the King Emperor the sum of two hundred rupees only.

Notice was given to the two petitioners on 4th February 1924 to produce Ramizuddi in the Sessions Court on 8th February 1924. That notice was not complied with, and Ramizuddi did not appear on that date, or on subsequent dates, to which the case was adjourned. The learned Judge instituted these proceedings on 26th March 1924, relying upon a report of the Sub-Divisional Officer to the effect that Ramizuddi was absconding. The order of the learned Judge which is referred to in para. 11 of the petition, was as follows:

Perused the report of S. D. O. of Munshiganj

Issue notice on the sureties to show cause why the bail bond should not be forfeited for their failure to produce the accused before this Court. Fix 9th April 1924 for hearing.

On 9th April 1924, the muktears appeared and through their learned pleader showed cause why the bond should not be forfeited; and the ground upon which the learned pleader relied, as far as I can ascertain, was that the sureties thought that the accused would not have to be produced until the reference which had been made to the learned Judge was disposed of; that they had sent a letter to the address of Ramizuddi merely informing him as to the date of hearing and remained satisfied with that without making any serious efforts to find him. That is not the ground which was relied upon in this Court. The first ground of the petition to this Court was as follows:

That the learned Sessions Judge not having complied with the requirements of S. 514, Criminal P. C., and not having recorded or taken any evidence of forfeiture before calling upon your petitioners to show cause under that section, the proceedings of the said learned Judge and the order complained of are illegal, ultra vires and void.

Section 514 (1) provides:

Whenever it is proved to the satisfaction of the Court by which a bond under this Code has been taken, or of the Court of a Presidency Magistrate or Magistrate of the 1st Class, or when the bond is for appearance before a Court, to the satisfaction of such Court, that such bond has been forfeited, the Court shall record the grounds of such proof, and may call upon any person bound by such bond to pay the penalty thereof, or to show cause why it should not be so paid.

In my judgment the provisions of this section indicate that two steps are to be taken: first, it must be proved to the satisfaction of the Court that the bond has been forfeited, whereupon the Court is to record the grounds of such proof; secondly, the Court, on being satisfied as aforesaid, may call upon the person bound by such bond to pay the penalty thereof, or to show cause why it should not be paid.

In my judgment the provisions as to the first step were complied with in this case. It appears that notice was given to the petitioners to show cause why the bail bond should not be forfeited. The petitioners appeared before the Sessions Judge to show cause. On that occasion it was admitted by them that they had executed the bond, and that they had received notice on 4th February to produce Ramizuddi on 8th February 1924 and the learned Judge expressed the opinion that a reasonable time had been allowed for the attendance of Ramizuddi. It does not appear whether the question as to the time allowed being sufficient and reasonable, was contested or not: If there is anything in this point it will be open to the petitioners to raise it on the further hearing which we propose to direct. The above-mentioned facts were recorded by the learned Judge in his judgment and the fact that Ramizuddi has not appeared on 8th February or on subsequent days was of course known to the learned Judge himself.

The learned Judge found that no cause had been shown why the bond should not be forfeited. This finding was not strictly in the proper form; he should have found that the bond had been forfeited. In effect, however, his judgment amounted to a finding that it had been proved that the bond had been forfeited and there is no doubt that he recorded the grounds of such proof.

In accordance with the terms of S. 514, Criminal P. C., the learned Judge should then have called upon the petitioners to pay the penalty of the bond or to show cause why it should not be paid. This step in the proceedings was not taken, although it appears that the petitioners, when showing cause against the forfeiture of the bond, presented arguments to the effect that they should not be called upon to pay the whole of the penalty specified in the bond. The learned Judge did not accept the argument and directed the Sub-Divisional Magistrate to levy the amount due from the petitioners.

I am not aware whether the petitioners will be able to produce any reasons, other than those already advanced, why the penalty should not be paid; but it is desirable that the provisions of the section should be observed, and the result, in my judgment, is that the Rule should be made absolute and the matter should be remanded in order that the learned Judge may call upon the petitioner to pay the penalty of the bond or to show cause why it should not be paid.

There should be no difficulty in the provisions of the Code in this respect being followed by the learned Judges and Magistrates in the Subordinate Courts. The provisions of S. 514 are clear, and the form 45 in Sch. 5 is given as a guide for the notice to a surety on the breach of a bond given for the appearance of a person before the Court.

A further point was taken, viz., that the bond did not specify the time and place in accordance with the provisions of S. 499, Criminal P. C.

The bond in this case was to the effect that we shall produce (or cause to appear) the accused at the Sessions Court at Dacca whenever called upon to do so.

In this bond the place was specified and the time mentioned was "whenever called upon to do so."

I am not prepared to hold that this form is illegal so as to deprive the learned Judge of jurisdiction.

In some cases it may be necessary to use that form. At the same time in my judgment it is desirable to follow the words of the section and to prescribe in the bond not only the place but also the time at which the accused is to attend. This will obviate the necessity of giving further notice to the sureties to procure the attendance of the accused: and even if the case cannot be tried or taken up on the day specified in the bond and has to be adjourned, the bail can be renewed so as to make it available until the day of the adjourned hearing.

The Rule, therefore, is made absolute and the matter remanded to the learned Judge so that, if he thinks it necessary to proceed further with the matter, he may take the steps which are prescribed in S. 514, Criminal P. C., and which are indicated in our judgment.

Penal Code S. 448—House trespass—Intention is the chief ingredient—Circumstances under which the alleged act was done must be looked into, to determine the intent.

For an offence under S. 448 intention is one of the most important ingredients and in order to determine the intent it is necessary to consider the circumstances under which the act was done by the accused as also the bona fide nature or otherwise of the claim which the accused may have in respect of the property itself. [P 263 C 2]

Order.—The complaint filed by the opposite party was in respect of offences under Ss. 448, 392, 143 and 341 I. P. C. On an examination of the opposite party on oath upon the complaint that was filed by him, the learned District Magistrate thought it proper to proceed against the accused only under S. 448. For an offence under that section intention is one of the most important ingredients, and in order to determine the intent it would be necessary to consider the circumstances under which the act was done by the accused as also the bona fide nature or otherwise of the claim which the accused may have in respect of the property itself. From that point of view the proceedings which are now pending with regard to the probate applied for by the petitioners are relevant and having regard to all the circumstances we consider it desirable that the present proceedings in the criminal Court should be stayed pending the disposal of the probate proceedings by the learned District Judge.

Civil Rules Nos. 825 and 826 of 1927, Decided on 10th November 1927, from order of Dist. Judge, 24 Pargannas (Alipore), dated 13th May 1927.

Provincial Insolvency Act, S. 75 (1)—Order of the District Judge under S. 68 is appealable.

An order of the District Judge under S. 68, dismissing the application of the aggrieved party on the ground that it was made beyond 21 days after the Receiver had taken possession of the property is appealable and, therefore, S. 115, Civil P. C., does not apply: 18 C. W. N. 366, Ref. [P 264 C 1]

Prafulla Kamal Das—for Petitioners.
Nripendra Chandra Das—for Opposite Party.

Judgment.—These two Rules have been obtained against an order of the District Judge of 24-Pargannas holding that an application to enquire into and rectify certain acts of the Receiver in an insolvency case was out of time and so could not be entertained. It appears that in a certain insolvency case a Receiver was appointed and he attached from the bargadars of one of the petitioners' paddy and sold it as being the property of the insolvent and in the other case he attached certain furniture. It appears that he also warned the tenants not to pay any more rent except to himself. The two petitioners feeling aggrieved at this order moved the District Judge, but he held that the matter came under S. 68, Provincial Insolvency Act, and so, as the application was made more than twenty-one days after the Receiver had taken possession of the properties, the matter was barred.

Thereupon applications were made to this Court and two Rules obtained on 24th June 1927. Subsequently, it appears that in July the two petitioners appeared before the District Judge and applied for leave to appeal to this Court against his order and the Judge granted them leave.

A preliminary point is taken and it seems to me one of substance that as the order of the District Judge in these two matters is appealable, S. 115, Civil P. C., has no application. Now, it is clear to my mind that the case must at least come under S. 75 (3) which makes it appealable to this Court by leave. Even if it did not become appealable by leave it is a matter decided by the Judge under S. 4 and is appealable. It is urged, however, for the petitioners that somehow or other they are strangers and not persons aggrieved, and in this connexion I am referred to the case of Hanseswar Ghosh v. Rakhal Das Ghose (1), but whether a person is aggrieved or not appears to be a question of fact and I cannot believe that a man whose paddy has been taken away and a man who has had his furniture taken away are not people who are aggrieved. I must, therefore, hold that the Rules must be discharged as an appeal lies, a fact which the learned Judge himself has admitted and the petitioners have admitted.

Emperor—Opposite Party.

Criminal Revn. No. 766 of 1923, Decided on 13th December 1923.

* Penal Code, S. 411—Mere suspicion on accused's part that property was dishonestly acquired is not enough.

The word "believe" in S. 411 is a very much stronger word than "suspect" and it involves the necessity of showing that the circumstances were such that a reasonable man must have felt convinced in his mind that the property with which he was dealing must be stolen property. It is not sufficient to show that the accused was careless for that he had reason to suspect that the property was stolen or that he did not make sufficient enquiry to ascertain whether it had been honestly acquired.

Panton, J.—The present rule has been obtained by A. G. Edgecombe who, at the time of his arrest, was the 5th engineer on S. S. Aronda. He has been convicted under S. 411, I. P. C., by the Chief Presidency Magistrate. The offence is found to have been committed in respect of packets containing 1,865 one rupee notes the subject of a theft which had occurred on S. S. Maihar. The rule was issued upon the ground that the elements necessary to constitute an offence under S. 411 not being present in the case the conviction was bad in law and should be set aside. It would appear that the theft of these, among other notes, was committed some time between 14th April and 29th May last. On 29th June last at 9 p. m. the present petitioner was arrested in Rangoon by an Excise Inspector, and the packets of notes in question were then found upon his person. He is said to have informed the Inspector at the time that these notes were forged or false notes. His explanation now is that he was conveying them from Calcutta to Rangoon at the request of a Chinese ship's carpenter with whom he was acquainted and that he was doing this as a friendly service. The findings of the learned Magistrate bearing on the points presented for consideration are:

I am satisfied that the accused was acting dishonestly and that he knew that he was engaged in some shady transaction.

Later on the Magistrate observes:

I think that he took the packets containing the notes, knowing that there was something shady about them, and that it was a transaction to be concealed from the authorities, but that he did not care to enquire what exactly was their nature. He knew generally that there was something wrong with them and may have supposed they might be forged.

Later on he observes:

I do not take his statement, that he had forged notes, to mean anything more than that he knew there was something wrong about them, but exactly what he had not troubled to ascertain.

Now the question is whether on findings such as these the petitioner could properly be convicted under S. 411, I. P. C., which requires that the person dishonestly receiving or retaining stolen property must know or have reason to believe the same to be stolen property. Now it was observed by Mr. Justice Melvill in the case of Empress v. Rango Simaji (1), that it was not sufficient to show that the accused was careless or that he had reason to suspect that the property was stolen or that he did not make sufficient enquiry to ascertain whether it had been honestly acquired and that the word "believe" in S. 414, I. P. C., is a very much stronger word than "suspect" and that it involved the necessity of showing that the circumstances were such that a reasonable man must have felt convinced in his mind that the property with which he was dealing must be stolen property. Applying this test to the present case it appears to me that the findings of fact of the learned Magistrate were not sufficient to justify the conviction of the present petitioner under S. 411.

In my opinion, this Rule must be made absolute and the conviction and sentence of the petitioner are set aside. The petitioner will be discharged from his bail bond.

Greaaves, J.—I agree.

Appeal No. 274 of 1922, Decided on 24th July 1923, against appellate order of Dist. Judge, 24-Parganas, D/- 30th June 1922.

(a) Civil P. C., O. 41, R. 27—Certified copy of a document not offered in evidence at the primary Court on account of the point not having been disputed—Such document should be admitted in appeal.

Where the certified copy of proceedings in a Small Cause Court was not filed in the primary Court as the point as to the proceedings having taken place was not seriously disputed then.

Held: it should be admitted at the appellate stage as a certified copy of a public document when the question arose at that stage.

(b) Civil P. C., S. 39—Section does not apply to a decree under the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act.

Section 39, Civil P. C., does not apply to decrees passed under the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act as that Act has its own provisions and rules for the execution of such decrees.

(c) Civil P. C., S. 39—Application for transfer of decree to the District Court A—Judgment-debtor resident in district B—The district Judge of A having jurisdiction over Districts both A and B—The application is in order.

An application for the transfer of a decree was made, to the District Court of A but the judgment-debtors were resident in district B. The District Judge of A had jurisdiction over both the administrative districts A and B.

Held: The application could not be said to be not in accordance with law.

Judgment.—This is an appeal against the order of the District Judge of the 24-Parganas affirming the order of the Subordinate Judge, fourth Court of Alipur, refusing the execution of a Small Cause Court decree on the ground that it is barred by limitation.

The appellants obtained a decree in the Presidency Small Cause Court on 4th December 1918. Their case is that on 11th August 1919 they made an application to the Small Cause Court Judge for transfer of the decree to the Hooghly District for execution and that by this application their application for execution made on 9th January 1922 was an application within time. The lower appellate Court has held: firstly, that they have not proved that any application was made for transmission of the decree; and secondly that the application was not in accordance with law.

As regards the first point: we think the learned District Judge was wrong in refusing to admit in evidence a certified copy of the proceedings of the Small Cause Court Judge which was filed at the appellate stage. Apparently in the first Court the fact that the application for transmission had been made was not seriously disputed. When the question arose before the appellate Court we think the learned Judge should have allowed the appellants to file this certified copy of a public document in order to prove that they had applied for transmission.

As regards the second point it has been held that the application was not in accordance with law because it did not comply with the provisions of S 39, Civil P. C. Here the learned Judge was in error for, under the Presidency Small Cause Court Act and the rules framed thereunder, S 39, Civil P. C., does not apply to decrees passed under that Act. S. 31, Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, provides for the transmission of decrees to be executed outside the jurisdiction of the Presidency Small Cause Court. The particular ground on which the application has been held to be not according to law is that it sought to transmit the decree to the Hooghly Court and it is found that the judgment-debtors neither resided nor carried on business in the Hooghly District. It appears from the evidence put before us that the judgment-debtors resided and had property at Uluberia which is a subdivision of the District Howrah using the word "district" in its ordinary sense as the jurisdiction of the District Magistrate. But it also appears that the District Judge of Hooghly has jurisdiction over both the administrative districts of Hooghly and Howrah. It, would, therefore appear that the fact that the application was made to a Court in the Hooghly District did not necessarily render it an application that was not in accordance with law.

But a difficulty arises as to the actual application that was made. In the copy of the proceeding which was filed before the lower appellate Court and which we have now admitted in evidence it appears that the order passed was that the copy of the judgment was to be transmitted to the Subordinate Judge's Court of Hooghly to be executed in the Munsif's Court of Uluberia. At the hearing of the appeal before us another certified copy of apparently the same proceeding has been filed and on that copy the order is recorded that the copy of the judgment be transmitted to the District Judge's Court of Hooghly to be executed in the Munsif's Court of Uluberia. If the application was for transmission to the District Judge's Court of Hooghly the application would appear to be in accordance with law. Cl (b), S 31, Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, enables the Presidency Small Cause Court to transfer a decree direct to the Court which would execute it and does not require it to be sent through the District Judge as is provided by the provision of the Civil Procedure Code in O. 21, R 5. At the same time there is nothing in S. 31 (b) which would prevent the Presidency Small Cause Court from transmitting a decree in the first instance to the District Judge within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the judgment-debtors reside or their property might be found.

A further objection has been taken on behalf of the respondents that the application was not in order, because it further requested that the decree should be executed by the Munsif of Uluberia. It is said that at the time this application was made the Munsif of Uluberia had not jurisdiction to execute a decree the total amount of which exceeded Rs. 2,000. We do not think that this renders the application not in accordance with law. If the application was properly sent to the District Judge the reference to the Munsif of Uluberia would not prevent him from sending it to the proper Court for executing it, if as a matter of fact the Munsif of Uluberia had not jurisdiction to execute the decree.

We think, therefore, that it is necessary that an enquiry should be made and it should be ascertained what was the order for transmission that was actually passed by the Presidency Small Cause Court. It is necessary not only for the decision of this appeal, but also because it is a serious matter that from the same Court two certified copies of the same proceeding differing in material particulars should issue. If from the result of this enquiry it appears that the application was for transmission to the Court of the District Judge of Hooghly we would hold that the application was made according to law and the present application for execution is not barred by limitation. Should it be found that the application was for transmission to the Subordinate Judge of Hooghly that would be an application for transmission to a Court which had not jurisdiction to execute the decree. It would then be necessary for the learned District Judge to consider whether the application was made in good faith or not. We are unable to accept his reasoning that because there is no evidence that the application was made in bona fide mistake it should be held that it was not made in good faith. Unless there are reasons to the contrary it seems unlikely that an application of this kind would be deliberately made for transmission to a Court not having jurisdiction, and having regard to the somewhat complicated nature of the jurisdiction of the District Judge of Hooghly an honest mistake is by no means impossible.

We accordingly set aside the order of the lower appellate Court and remand the appeal to him for rehearing and decision in accordance with these directions, and also we direct that he do make a full enquiry as to the issue of these two discrepant copies which will be sent to him. They will be marked Exs. H C 1 and H C 2.

The costs will abide the result. We assess the hearing-fee at two gold mohurs Judgment.—The facts which have given rise to the order against which this Rule is directed are shortly as follows: The petitioners obtained a decree against certain judgment-debtors in 1910 in Money Suit No. 750/1164 of that year. In 1920 a jote of the judgment-debtors was sold in execution of rent decree obtained by the landlords and was purchased by some other parties and the sum of Rs. 525 was deposited by them in Court in two instalments. The petitioners had failed to realize the amount of their decree of 1910 and they, on the amount of Rs. 525 being put in by the auction-purchasers, applied for attachment of a certain portion of the said amount, Rs. 287-10-0 having gone towards the satisfaction of the decree for rent and Rs 237-6-0 being left in Court as surplus sale proceeds. As a result of the proceedings thus instituted by the petitioners, they were allowed to withdraw Rs. 79-2-0 from Court, out of the aforesaid amount deposited by the auction-purchasers, in part satisfaction of their decree of 1910. In 1922 the amount of Rs 79-2-0 was thus withdrawn by the petitioners. It appears that thereafter there were certain proceedings under O. 21, R 90, Civil P C., to which the petitioners were not parties and of which, it is said, no notice was given to them, as a result of which the sale in execution of the rent decree to which I have already referred was set aside by the Court. On the sale being set aside, as aforesaid, the auction-purchasers applied to get back their purchase money and upon that the learned Munsif made an order in their favour against which the present Rule is directed.

The substance of the contention that has been urged in support of the Rule is to the effect that the order setting the sale aside was passed in contravention of the provisions of O. 21, R. 92, of the Code which makes it obligatory on the Court to issue notices of the application for setting aside the sale to all the parties affected by the order that has to be passed on such application. It is urged that, in the present case, the petitioners were not given such notices, that the order setting aside the sale was, therefore, one passed without jurisdiction and that inasmuch as the petitioners would suffer irreparable loss, if they are now called upon to refund the amount which they have withdrawn in part satisfaction of their own decree, the learned Munsif acted without jurisdiction and also improperly in making the order aforesaid. The whole basis of the petitioner's contention seems to me to be what is alleged by them in para. 10 of their petition and which is to the effect that the order setting the sale aside was passed without jurisdiction inasmuch as no notice was served on them and further that the proceeding held in connexion with the application for setting the sale aside was a collusive and benami affair. It may be conceded that if the order setting the sale aside may be looked upon as a nullity, the petitioners are entitled to urge that they are not bound by it and that any further or consequential orders that may have been passed on the basis of it should also be set aside.

It may also be conceded that in view of the proviso to sub-R. 2, R. 92 the Court should not have passed an order on the application for setting aside the sale without giving notice of the application to all the persons affected by such an order. But I find it very difficult to hold that merely because no notice was given of the application, the order which the Court passed was one that can be said to have been passed without jurisdiction. It was an order which the Court was wrong in passing and the parties whose interests were affected by the order may very well complain of its validity. But it is quite a different thing to say that it can be regarded as an order passed entirely without jurisdiction. The petitioners do not appear to have challenged the validity of the order itself either by an application for review or by moving against it or by taking such other measures as the law allows. So long as the order is not set aside all consequences that it may legitimately lead to will follow. The present application on which this rule has been granted is not directed against that order but against a subsequent order which has been passed directing the petitioners and the judgment-debtor to refund the amount which had been withdrawn by them. I am unable to see what relief the petitioners can expect in this Rule so long as this Court is not competent to go behind the order that was passed setting aside the sale. The provisions of O. 21, R. 93 of the Code are imperative. The rule runs in these words:

Where a sale of immovable property is set aside under R. 92, the purchaser shall be entitled to an order for repayment of his purchase money, with or without interest as the Court may direct, against any person to whom it has been paid.

In the present case the sale has been set aside under R. 92. The order by which the sale has been set aside is at the present moment a subsisting order and so long as it subsists it must attract the operation of R. 93. In support of the argument that the equities are in favour of the petitioners and that they should not be made to suffer in consequence of an order passed in the proceedings to which they were not parties, reference has been made to the decision of the Judicial Committee in the case of Jai Berham v Kedar Nath Marwari (1), and also to a decision of the Madras High Court in the case of Raja Rao v. Anantha Narayanan Chetty (2). These two decisions have very little bearing upon the present case as the statutory obligations arising under R. 93, O. 21, Civil P. C. did not come in for consideration in either of them. Whatever other remedies the petitioners may have in connexion with this matter, I am clearly of opinion that on the facts, as they are, the present Rule cannot be made absolute. The Rule is accordingly discharged; but in view of the circumstances of the case, I make no order as to the costs.

The fact that the evidence had been summarized at great length by both sides and the jury had taken notes from the arguments and had themselves made a complete summary of the evidence for their own convenience would not relieve the Judge from the duty of conforming to the provisions of S. 297, which distinctly lays down that he should sum up the evidence. 27 Bom. 644, Ref. Held: that exposition of the law on the right of private defence was not exhaustive, for, under S. 97, I. P. Camell and Upendra Kumar Roy—for Appellants.Khondkar—for the Crown.Nripendra Chandra Das—for Complainant.

Judgment.—The appellants who are fifteen in number were tried by the Additional Sessions Judge of Tippera with the aid of a jury. The jury unanimously found all the appellants guilty under S. 147, I. P. C., and one of them, viz., appellant 6, guilty also under S. 323, I. P. C. The learned Judge accepting the verdict of the jury convicted these appellants under S. 147, I. P. C. and sentenced each of them to undergo rigorous imprisonment for nine months. He also convicted appellant 6 under S. 323, I. P. C., and sentenced him to undergo rigorous imprisonment for six months, this sentence to run concurrently with that passed under S. 147, I. P. C.

The learned Judge in charging the jury at the close of the case did not sum up the evidence that was adduced in this case. He observed that the evidence had been summarized against each accused at great length by both sides and he, therefore, left it to the jury to consider upon the lines which he had indicated what conclusion they should draw from that evidence. The reason why the learned Judge did not sum up the evidence is to be found in a note which he has embodied in his heads of charge. That note runs as follows:

The charge I had originally prepared for delivery has been destroyed by me purposely. In it I had myself summarized by narrative and charts the evidence against each of the seventeen accused. Such a summary in fact it is in most cases incumbent on the Judge to put before the jury. In the present case, however, my own opinion on the question of the truth or falsehood of the prosecution case is so very strong that I found it impossible to place this evidence before the jury without indicating at every time my opinion in such a way as I know might fail to leave their decision as unfettered as the law contemplates it must be in a jury trial. I have, therefore, deliberately, in fairness to the side whose story I find unacceptable, omitted to comment on the actual evidence in detail. The jury have taken down from the arguments a complete summary of the evidence against each accused, and the fact that there is no necessity to do so again supports my conviction that under the circumstances it would be more discreet not to do so.

Now, the law with regard to this matter is quite clear and is to be found in S. 297, Criminal P. C. That section says:

In cases tried by jury, when the case for the defence and the prosecution's reply (if any) are concluded, the Court shall proceed to charge the jury, summing up the evidence for the prosecution and defence, and laying down the law by which the jury are to be guided.

Upon the plain words of this section it is abundantly clear that the learned Judge should sum up the evidence for the prosecution and the defence in the course of his charge to the jury. The object of summing up the evidence is to enable the jury to arrive at a right decision on the facts and a proper summing up is one in which the learned Judge makes a clear and distinct statement of the evidence on both sides with such advice as to the legal bearing of that evidence and the weight which should properly be attached to the several parts of it as sound judicial discretion would suggest.

The fact that the evidence had been summarized at great length by both sides and the jury had taken notes from the arguments and had themselves made a complete summary of the evidence for their own convenience would not, in our opinion, relieve the learned Judge from the duty of conforming to the provisions of S. 297, Criminal P. C., which distinctly lays down that he should sum up the evidence. If any authority is needed for this proposition we may refer to the case of Emperor v Malgowda Basgowda (1). The reason why the learned Judge refrained from summing up the evidence is that he himself had formed a rather strong opinion on questions of fact and he apprehended that it would be impossible for him to place the evidence before the jury without indicating the opinion which he had formed, and if he indicated that opinion it would probably fetter the decision of the jury. We do not quite understand why that should be so, so long as the learned Judge does not endeavour to persuade the jury to agree with him and clearly tells them that they are the sole judges of facts and that they are not bound to accept any opinion on questions of fact which he may express. If a proper caution to this effect is duly administered there can be no objection to the learned Judge's expressing his own opinion to the jury. Of course it is desirable that he should not express his opinion too strongly. But if he happens to do so and sufficiently warns the jury we do not think that there can be any objection. In fact the law allows such a course. S. 298, sub-S. 2, lays down that the Judge may, if he thinks proper, in the course of his summing up express to the jury his opinion upon any question of fact, or upon any question of mixed law and fact relevant to the proceeding.

And it is obvious that in many cases it is not merely permissible but also desirable that the learned Judge should tell the jury what view he has taken of the facts in order to enable them to consider the facts properly and arrive at their own decision on them. Even under the Code of 1861, in which there was no provision corresponding to that contained in sub-S. 2, S. 298, it was held by this Court in the case of Dwarka Nath Sen (2) that there can be no doubt that a Sessions Judge is bound to sum up properly, that he ought to advise the jury on questions of fact, and that there is no objection, to use the words of the learned Chief Justice Tindal, to the Judge's letting the jury know the impression which the evidence has made upon his own mind.

The omission to place the evidence before the jury and to give them proper direction with regard to that evidence is a material defect in the charge and must necessarily cause prejudice.

There is another point to which our attention has been drawn by the learned counsel for the appellants and that is with reference to the learned Judge's direction on the question of the law as to the right of private defence. The learned Judge told the jury that the essence of the law of private defence is that the person exercising it must be possessed of reasonable fear either for his own safety or the safety of his property. This exposition of the law on the right of private defence is not exhaustive. For under S. 97, I. P. C., the right of private defence extends under the restrictions specified in that section not only to the defence of one's own body or property, but to the body or property of any other person as well.

For the above reasons we think that there has been no proper summing up, and the direction to which we have just referred is also not free from objection. That the accused have been prejudiced by defects in the learned Judges charge is clear from the fact that the learned Judge was not prepared to agree with the verdict of the jury. We, therefore, think that the conviction of and the sentences passed on the appellants should be set aside, and we accordingly do set them aside.

Having regard to the view taken by the learned Judge of the evidence in the case we do not order a retrial, but we leave it open to the authorities to take further proceedings against the accused if they consider it proper to do so.

S. K. Sen, Satindra Nath Mukherjee and Manindra Lal Bose—for Petitioners.

Order.—The petitioners who obtained this Rule have been convicted one of an offence punishable under S. 211, I. P. C. and the other of abetment of that offence. The first ground on which the Rule was granted was that in the original trial arising out of the complaint now found to be false the depositions were not read over in accordance with the provisions of S. 360, Criminal P. C. In the explanation submitted by the District Magistrate it is admitted that this was not done. But it is urged that this could not have vitiated the trial in the present case as the proceedings in the former case had not been used in evidence. It appears, however, from the trying Magistrate's judgment that at least one deposition was used in evidence in that case. The deposition of Basir Ex. 29 is mentioned more than once. That an omission to comply with the provisions of S. 360 Criminal P. C., is a bar to the use of the deposition as evidence was decided long ago.

The Rule was also granted on the ground that the elements necessary to constitute offences under Ss. 211 and 211/109 I. P. C., not being present in the case the convictions are bad in law. Though there are findings sufficient to support the convictions, on a consideration of the judgments both of the trying Magistrate and of the appellate Court we hold that the case is not one in which we should order a retrial after reversing the present convictions on the ground of the wrong admission of evidence. The complaint which is found to have been false was against one Emajuddi. We may take it that Emajuddi was wrongly accused and did not abduct the wife of the petitioner Basir. But there seems very little material on the record to justify the conclusion that Basir accused him knowing that there was no just or lawful ground for such a charge. The principal fact against him appears to be that when on 20th June he laid information at the thana he accused another person. But the prosecution have not shown that he did not receive other information before he complained before the Magistrate on 25th June.

The case against the other petitioner Choyenuddin who has been convicted of abetment rests on the fact that he assisted Basir in taking legal proceedings and that he had a reason for wishing to harm Emajuddi. But it does not seem to have occurred to the lower Court that this enmity with Emajuddi may well have led him to support Basir's complaint believing it to be true to an extent which he would not have done but for this enmity.

On the whole we do not think that it will serve any useful purpose to order a retrial. The Rule is made absolute. We set aside the convictions and sentences passed on the petitioners and direct that they be discharged from their bail bonds.

Where the subject-matters of the two suits were the same and where the Court decided the previous case after both sides had given certain amount of evidence and wrote a judgment upon the merits dismissing the suit in plaintiff's absence and no appeal was preferred against that judgment,

Held: that it cannot be alleged that previous judgment has no worth because the decree in the suit was nothing more than a dismissal for default and that the matter was res judicata.

Judgment—In this case the plaintiff sued to recover rent for the years 1322 to 1325 at the rate of Rs. 66-5-6 a year. The defendant contested the suit denying the relationship of landlord and tenant and contending that the suit was barred by the principle of res judicata. The learned Munsif found that the relationship of landlord and tenant did not exist between the parties and that the suit was barred by the principle of res judicata. In appeal the learned Subordinate Judge found on both points against the finding of the Munsif and decreed the appeal. On the case coming up before us, the main point argued is that of res judicata. The plaintiff's case is that he holds a ganti settlement from the Talukdar Purna Chandra Bose and the jama in question was originally held by the defendant directly under Purna Chandra Bose. Purna Chandra Bose brought a Suit (No. 259 of 1915) against the defendant in respect of a jama and that suit was dismissed. The defendant's case is that that suit acts as res judicata. The jama of the land in respect of which rent was then claimed is the same as in the present case and the case was decided on the merits. The plaintiff's case, however, is that the jama is not necessarily the same. In the plaint in the former suit the rent claimed was Rs. 66-5-0 and now it is Rs. 66-5-6; and in the second place, as the first suit was not decided on the merits, it should be treated as one which has merely been dismissed for default. It appears that in the Suit No. 259 of 1915 a certain amount of evidence had been recorded on behalf of the plaintiff and defendant and the case adjourned on their application for further evidence on each side. On the next hearing day the plaintiff did not appear and the suit was determined in his absence. It is argued that such determination would only amount to dismissal and has the same value as the dismissal under O. 9, R. 8. Now, as regards the first point, there is no doubt that the suit of 1915 referred to the same jama and to the same land as the present suit. No doubt, there was a mistake of two pice in the rental which was sought to be corrected, but such correction was refused. But we have compared the subject-matters of the two suits and it is obvious that they are the same. As to the second point, the Munsif decided the case and wrote a judgment upon the merits. No appeal was preferred against that judgment and in our opinion, it cannot now be alleged that it has no worth because the decree in the suit was nothing more than a dismissal for default. The learned Munsif came to the finding that there was no relationship of landlord and tenant after recording the evidence of both sides on the subject. We must hold for the reason that the matter is res judicata.

The result is that this appeal is allowed and the suit dismissed with costs in this and the lower appellate Courts.

Judgment.—This rule is heard ex parte. In this matter the plaintiff sued to recover a certain share of a tank on declaration of his title thereto. The defendant appeared, the case was adjourned until it was over a year old and on 15th June last came on for hearing. The plaintiff was examined and the defendant was examined in part. A verbal application followed by a written application was then made on behalf of the plaintiff as there were certain formal defects—leave was prayed for to withdraw from the suit with liberty to bring a fresh suit. This application was strenuously opposed and the learned Munsif rejected it. But instead of then finishing the case and deciding it on the evidence on the record and on such further evidence in the case as might be adduced he made declaration that the plaintiff is permitted to withdraw from the suit without liberty to bring a fresh suit with costs to be paid to the contesting defendant and subsequently made a memo. of such costs. Now as was pointed out in the case of Mahant Biharidasji v. Parshotamdas Ramdas (1), the proper course is if the Munsif did not consider that the application for withdrawal with liberty to bring a fresh suit should be granted, to dismiss the application and then go on with the case. This ruling has been followed also in the case of Kamini Kumar Roy v. Rajendra Nath Roy (2), and is also in accordance with the decision of a Division Bench of this Court in the case of Suradhani Debya v. Chandra Nath Pramanik (3). I must hold, therefore, that the order of the Munsif does not amount to a dismissal of the suit or to the suit being withdrawn unconditionally. I, therefore, set aside what appears to be an order disposing of the suit in this way and order that the case do go back to the learned Munsif to proceed to dispose of the suit on the assumption that the application to withdraw with liberty to bring a fresh suit has been refused. It follows too that the present order for costs in favour of the defendants must also be set aside as it will be for the Munsif now to dispose of the suit as a contested suit in the ordinary way.

To this extent the Rule is made absolute. No one appearing on the opposite side, I make no order as to costs in the Court.

Appeal No. 2069 of 1921, Decided on 18th July 1923 from appellate decree of 2nd Additional Dist. Judge, Midnapur, D/- 11th August 1921.

Landlord and Tenant—Non-transferable occupancy holding—Sale of—Acceptance of rent by landlord from transferee described as marfatdar in receipt—Question of landlord being estopped from suing for khas possession depends on facts of each case.

The question of the landlord being estopped from suing for the khas possession of a non-transferable occupancy holding, which has been transferred to a third party from which third party the landlord has accepted rent and granted a receipt therefor, but describing therein the third party as marfatdar, depends on the facts of each case: 17 C. Where in such a case the landlord had previously declared that on transfer the occupancy holding had become abandoned and subsequently accepted rent from the transferee describing him in the receipt as marfatdar of the original tenant.

Pyari Mohan Chatterjee—for Appellant.

S. Maiti and B. Apurba K. Mukerjee—for Respondents.

Sanderson, C. J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff against the judgment of the learned Additional District Judge of Midnapur.

The point which arises on this appeal may be stated in the words of the learned District Judge at the beginning of his judgment, whether the landlord's claim for khas possession of the lands of a non-transferable occupancy holding is debarred by his having recognized a private purchase and he is estopped from suing for khas possession.

The learned vakil for the appellant has drawn our attention to several cases in which the Court had to deal with a dakhila granted to a transferee of a non-transferable occupancy holding as marfatdar of the original tenant: and, the learned vakil contended that the principle of those cases should be applied to this case and the appeal should be allowed.

In my judgment the principle which should be applied to such a case as this was laid down by Sir Lawrence Jenkins when he was the Chief Justice of this Court, in the case of Prabhabati Dassi v. Taibatunnessa Choudhurani (1) and the passage to which I refer is at p. 1091 as follows:

But it is said, on the other side, that those receipts do not amount to a recognition because they are marfatdari receipts and, therefore, have no such legal effect as defendant 1 claims. I am inclined to think that Courts have yielded too freely to the temptation of being blinded to realities by the words "marfatdar" and "gujratdar" and so the true facts have suffered. At the same time I am bound to admit that there are expressions in the cases which would suggest that where these words appear no recognition can be inferred. I think, however, each case must be determined on its own circumstances, and the Court should determine in each case whether, on a consideration of all the facts—not merely by giving undue weight to words used—a legal inference is or is not to be drawn that there has been a recognition establishing a relationship of landlord and tenant between one who has paid and another who has received rent for a number of years.

That statement, it is quite true, as the learned vakil pointed out, was not necessary for the decision of that case, but the principle was adopted by my learned brother Mr. Justice Chatterjee in the case of Monmoth Nath Mitter v. Anath Bundhu Pal (2), the passage being at p. 214. In my judgment that is now accepted, at all events so far as this Court is concerned, as the proper principle which ought to be applied to such a case as this. I, therefore, have to consider whether there were in this case such facts as would justify the learned Additional District Judge in arriving at the conclusion that the plaintiff had recognized the father of the first four defendants, whose name was Sadananda, Mahapatra, as the tenant.

The suit was brought on the 18th September 1918, and it appeared that the original tenant of the non-transferable occupancy holding was Guru Prosad, and he had purported to sell his holding to his father in December 1910. One of the allegations in the plaint was that Guru Prosad had abandoned the land without making any arrangement for the payment of the rent of the same; and both the learned vakils agreed that the allegation as to the abandonment was based upon the sale which was alleged to have been made in December 1910. Therefore, we must approach this case upon the allegation of the plaintiff that the original tenant Guru Prosad had abandoned the land so long ago as 1910. A suit was brought for rent, and a decree was obtained and a sale was about to take place when the amount necessary to meet the decree was deposited by the purchaser, that is to say, Sadananda Mahapatra, the predecessor of defendants 1 to 4.

The learned Munsif, when he allowed the purchaser to deposit the decretal dues, added a note that the order would not affect the rights of any party. In February 1915, the plaintiff, alleging that the money which was lying in the Court belonged to him, made an application that it should be paid to him: he took the money out of Court without making any protest against the order of the Munsif allowing the deposit to be made by the alleged purchaser. In July 1917 a rent receipt was granted by the plaintiff and that is described in the learned Judge's judgment as follows:

He accepted rents from the private purchaser and granted a dakhila in the name of the late tenant but describing the purchaser as mar-fatdar.

As I have said, this suit was brought in 1918. In this case, it is true that the dakhila described the person, who paid the rent, as an agent of the original tenant, but as I read the learned Judge's judgment it amounts to this, that that description of the purchaser was not a correct description. I find it difficult to understand how the purchaser could be properly described as agent of the original tenant in 1917, when it is remembered that the original tenant, as alleged by the landlord, had abandoned the land so long ago as 1910.

It is not necessary for me to say more than that, in my judgment, applying the principle which was laid down by Sir Lawrence Jenkins in the case to which I have referred, there was sufficient material before the learned Additional District Judge to justify him in concluding that the plaintiff had recognized the purchaser.

Consequently, in my judgment, this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Richardson, J.—I agree.

Judgment.—One Kailas Chandra Mukherji died in November 1910 leaving a will dated 28th August 1908. He left two sons, Jnanendra and Debendra, by his first wife and four sons, Jogendra, Jatindra, Jitendra and Jonendra by his second wife. He also left a daughter Ashalata by his second wife, who was unmarried at the time of his death. Jnanendra, Debendra and Jogendra had attained majority at the date of the will, and Kailas Chandra Mukherji appointed all the said three sons as executors. Jogendra, however, died during the lifetime of his father, a few months before the death of the latter. No probate was taken of the will, but on 17th January 1921, there was an agreement between the first party consisting of Jnanendra and Debendra and the second party consisting of Jatindra, Jitendra and Jonendra by which the disputes between them were referred to the arbitration of three gentlemen, Babu Nanda Lal Pal, Babu Hari Charan Chatterji and Babu Kanti Chandra Ghose. The arbitrators made their award on 25th November 1921. On 1st February 1922, Jnanendra and Debendra applied to the Court against Jatindra, Jitendra and Jonendra that the award might be filed. This gave rise to the suit which was tried by the Subordinate Judge, 2nd Court, Hooghly. The Subordinate Judge made an order refusing to file the award and dismissed the suit. Hence this appeal.

It was stated in the argument that a dispute had arisen between the two parties for the partition of the movable and immovable properties left by their father and in respect of the construction of the will and also with regard to the accounts connected with the estate left by him. It was stipulated that:

Both the parties shall be bound by the award that may be given by the said arbitrators on making a partition or any other settlement in respect of the self-acquired moveable and immovable properties of our father, by relying on the evidence and documents that may be put forward. None of the parties shall be competent to raise any objection or plea thereto. The parties shall all be bound by the decisions arrived at by the arbitrators, with respect to the respective assets or liabilities of the parties after examining and looking through the accounts of the income and expenditure of the estate left by our father since his death.

The will was put forward as one of the documents in the case, but the arbitrators thought, to quote their own words, that it was "unworthy of evidence." The arbitrators nevertheless referred to the will, but only for the purpose of ascertaining the testator's intention and not with the object of giving effect to the same, and, on the other hand, the arrangement contemplated by the testator was freely departed from in the award. As regards partition the allotments were made in contravention of the terms of the will in order to suit the desire of the parties or their mutual convenience. The unmarried daughter Ashalata, who was not a party to the agreement or the suit, had been given certain ornaments by the will, but the arbitrators held that Kailas had no authority to dispose of them and they awarded the same to the plaintiffs. There were other variations made though they were of minor importance. The award also gave credit in favour of the plaintiffs in respect of a sum of Rs. 4,500 on the ground of maintenance charges incurred by them on account of the defendants.

The Subordinate Judge has dismissed the suit upon three main grounds, and these grounds have been challenged before us.

The first ground on which the Subordinate Judge has proceeded is that in his opinion the arbitrators exceeded their authority. In his opinion the arbitrators had no power to partition the properties or award the ornaments in violation of the terms of the will as the parties did not challenge its propriety, and any intention on their part to do away with it was not apparent. So far as this ground is concerned I am unable to agree in the view of the learned Subordinate Judge, for the terms of the agreement left it open to the arbitrators to make any award they thought fit either in accordance with or in contravention of the will. In my opinion the arbitrators did not exceed their authority. It is true that the award purported to interfere with the rights of strangers—notably the daughter Ashalata—and the strangers would not in any event be affected by it; but as between the parties to the award its provisions must be held to be operative if there is no other question about its validity.

The next ground on which the learned Subordinate Judge rested his decision is that one of the arbitrators, Babu Nanda Lal Pal did not assent to one of the terms of the award, namely, that about the credit of Rs. 4,500 in favour of the plaintiffs on account of the maintenance of the defendants. The finding has been assailed before us and reliance in this respect has been placed upon certain passages in the deposition of the said arbitrator Babu Nanda Lal Pal as indicating a failure of memory on his part and also upon the deposition of another arbitrator Babu Kanti Chandra Ghose as establishing that there was such assent. A careful study of the evidence of these two gentlemen has convinced me that there must have been a misunderstanding in the matter, that is to say, Babu Nanda Lal Pal never assented to this particular provision, while Babu Kanti Chandra Ghose on his part honestly thought that Babu Nanda Lal Pal had given his assent. It is impossible to believe that such a positive statement as the one which Babu Nanda Lal Pal made in answer to the Court towards the end of his deposition was due to a failure of memory. Both the witnesses are quite respectable and their integrity is beyond reproach. On this ground alone the dismissal of the suit is amply justified.

Another ground on which the judgment of the Subordinate Judge rests is that the plaintiffs being executors could not legally make any reference to arbitration which would go against the terms of the will. This proposition has been challenged, it being urged that it will not hold good in this case as the plaintiffs have not taken probate of the will and have not accepted their office as executors. Now the office of executor being a private office of trust named by the testator and not by the law one named executor may refuse the office or renounce. It is, however, too late to refuse or renounce when one has once elected to act as executor; and he may determine such election by acts which amount to an administration. The acts which amount to an administration, so that the party cannot afterwards refuse are: (1) anything done by the executor with relation to the effects of the testator which shows an intention in him to take upon him the executorship, and (2) whatever acts will make a man not named executor in the will, liable as executor de son tort (William on Executors, 11th edn., Vol. 1, p. 194). In the present case the plaintiffs, and for the matter of that the defendants as well, put the will forward and relied on its contents, and were unable to agree as to its construction, but never showed any intention to act in defiance of its terms beyond leaving it to the arbitrators to settle the dispute in the best way they could and agreeing to abide by the award that they would make. The plaintiffs who are two of the executors named in the will, have been handling the estate and effects of the testator ever since his death which took place so far back as 1910. Far from refusal or renunciation the reference to the arbitration, one of the matters referred thereby being the construction of the will itself, affords ample indicia of the plaintiffs having accepted the office.

They cannot be permitted to enter into an agreement the result of which may be, and in this particular case has been, to bring about an award nullifying the intention of the testator. The object sought to be attained by such an agreement is something that the law does not permit, namely, to allow the parties to acquire title to property in contravention of the terms of a will in a case where the title is claimed under the will itself, to allow the executors to have the will construed by a tribunal of their own choice without proving the will and evading of the duty fixed by law, and to allow the executors and some of the legatees to join together and make an arrangement for the distribution of the properties contrary to the testator's intention and to the prejudice and detriment of the remaining legatee or legatees under the will. The Court which is asked to pass a judgment and issue a decree in accordance with such an award may very well refuse to do so treating the award as an invalid one. Under the English law when it is too late for an executor to renounce, he having once elected to act as such, he may be cited to take probate and his disobedience will amount to a contempt of Court.

In my opinion, therefore, the decision of the Court below is right and this appeal should be dismissed with costs, hearing-fee being assessed at three gold mohurs.

Judgment.—We are invited in this appeal to examine the propriety of an order of dismissal, made on an application for letters of administration with copy of will annexed in respect of the estate of one Sibsundari Debi. The lady made a testamentary disposition on 15th June 1896. She died in the following month leaving four sons, two of whom had been married. The will recites that as the sons were of extravagant habits, it was necessary to take steps for the preservation of the estate. The property was consequently left to the two daughters-in-law and various directions were given for its management and distribution. On 2nd January 1920, the daughters-in-law made the present application for letters of administration to the estate of their mother-in-law with copy of her will annexed. The application was opposed by one Srish Chandra Bhattacharyya, who claimed an interest in the estate by purchase at a sale held in execution of a decree against the sons of the deceased, who would have taken the estate in the event of intestacy. In view of the decisions of this Court in In the matter of Bhobosoonduri Dabee (1) and Surbo Mongala v. Sasi Bhusan (2), the objector was clearly entitled to take exception to the grant of letters of administration. But the District Judge has not investigated the case on the merits at all; he has rejected the application on the preliminary ground that as the estate has been sold in execution of a decree on a mortgage granted by the heirs-at-law, it had been "administered," and there was no occasion for the grant of letters of administration. In support of this extraordinary view, he has invoked the authority of the decision in Lalit Chandra v. Baikuntha Nath (3). We are of opinion that the order made by the District Judge cannot be maintained either on authority or on principle.

It may be conceded that where the object of the litigation appears to be not to administer the estate left upon the death of the deceased but merely to obtain a declaration of heirship so as to fortify the position of the successful party in a regular suit that may be instituted no grant should be made. This position is borne out by the decisions in In the goods of Nursingh Chandra (4), Lakshmi Narain v. Nanda Rani (5) Chandi

Charan v. Banke Behary (6), Lalit Chandra v. Baikunta Nath (3), Parsania v. Hari Charan (7) and Prasanna Kumari v. Ram Chandra (8). But there is no room for the operation of this principle where an application is made for probate of a will or for letters of administration with copy of the will annexed. There is, as explained in Charu Chandra v. Nohush Chandra (9) a fundamental distinction between letters of administration to the estate of an intestate and letters of administration, not upon intestacy, but with copy of the will annexed. In the latter case, we have to take account of the fact that S. 187, Succession Act, which is not reproduced in the Probate and Administration Act, but is made applicable to the wills of Hindus by S. 2, Hindu Wills Act, as amended by S. 174, Probate and Administration Act, ordains that no right as executor or legatee can be established in any Court of justice unless a Court of competent jurisdiction in British India shall have granted probate of the will under which the right is claimed or shall have granted letters of administration with the will or with a copy of an authenticated copy of the will annexed.

Reference may in this connexion be made to the case of Adwaita Charan v. Krishna (10). In that case, it was ruled that where a will has been propounded and proved, the probate Court should grant probate even though it should appear that there were no debts due to or by the testator and the legatees have been in possession in accordance with the terms of the will for a long time, as it is absolutely necessary for the legatees to establish their title by proof of the will. The probate Court cannot go into the question whether the legatees have or have not acquired independent title by adverse possession. Chatterjee, J., pointed out that there was no conflict of authorities on the point. In the cases of In the goods of Nursing Chandra Bysack (4), Lalit Chandra v. Baikunta Nath (3), Parsania v. Hari Charan (5) and Prasanna Kumari v. Ram Chandra (8) there was no will, and the application was for grant of letters of administration upon intestacy. In Lakshmi Narain v. Nanda Rani (5) and Chandi Charan v. Banker Behary (6), there was a will which had been probated; but in the one case permission was sought to sell the estate in the course of administration and in the other case letters of administration were sought after the death of the executor. In both cases, it was ruled that no order should be made, inasmuch as there was evidence to show that the estate had been completely administered and no further action was needed on the part of the Court. We may point out that the decision, in Adwaita Chandra Mandal v. Krishna Dhan Sircar (10), is in conformity with that in Charu Chandra v. Nohush Chandra (9). There the will had been executed on 9th March 1889, the testator died on 29th April 1894, and the application for letters of administration was made on 26th June 1916, that is, more than 22 years after the death of the testator; yet the District Judge granted letters of administration on 13th July 1917 and the grant was confirmed by this Court on 14th November 1917. We observe that in Sarojini v. Haridas Ghose (11), probate was granted, though the estate had been sold in execution of a decree against the heir-at-law, who had been excluded from the succession by the testamentary disposition. In that case, as here, the grant was opposed by the purchaser who claimed title from the apparent heir-at-law. Finally the decision in Charu Chandra v. Nohush Chandra (9) shows that when a grant has been made the grantee may have to face considerable difficulty when he seeks to recover the estate from the persons in possession; that, however, is no ground for refusal of the application. The order made by the District Judge cannot be supported and must be discharged.

The result is that this appeal is allowed, the decree of the Court below set aside and the case remitted to that Court in order that the question of genuineness of the will may be investigated on such evidence as may be adduced by each side. The appellants are entitled to their costs in this Court. We assess the hearing-fee at two gold mohurs. The costs in the lower Court will abide the result.

Landlord and Tenant—Tenancy-at-will—Notice to quit given according to T. P. Act, S. 105—Tenant is liable to be ejected.

When the tenant is a tenant-at-will and his tenancy has been determined by a notice to quit under S. 106, T. P. Act, he is liable to be ejected, irrespective of the terms of the contract determining the tenancy. [P 280 C 1]

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of an ejectment suit which was brought by six plaintiffs against the defendant after service of notice to quit. The defendant was holding the land under a kabulyat dated Aswin 1312, which was one for a lease from year to year. He took lease of the tank for the purpose of rearing fish therein undertaking not to cut trees standing on the banks or to do any act prejudicial to the tank. The plaintiff's case was that the defendant had cut down and appropriated some trees on the bank, and had allowed weeds and mars to grow on the water rendering it unfit for human consumption. The plaintiffs thereupon served a notice to quit upon the defendant, putting an end to the tenancy which the defendant had by his conduct forfeited. The trial Court dismissed the suit on the ground that the plaintiffs had failed to prove that as a matter of fact the defendant was guilty of any act injurious to the tank. The plaintiffs appealed against the decree of the Munsif, and the appeal was heard by Mr A. H. Carter on 20th April 1921. The appeal was allowed and the plaintiff's suit decreed. On 29th April 1921, an application was filed before the Judge by two persons Aputtam Sen and Mohan Krishna Sen to be substituted in place of plaintiff 5 (Bodhi Satta Sen) who, it was alleged, had died on 31st January 1921. Notice was ordered to be served of this application and it came on for hearing before Mr. J. A. Ross who had succeeded Mr. Carter as District Judge of Murshidabad. It was heard on 20th August 1921, when the following order was passed:

It is ordered that the legal representative of the deceased appellant will be brought on the record and the appeal will be reheard. Fix 28th September 1921 for hearing.

The effect of this order was to vacate the judgment of Mr. Carter delivered on 20th April 1921. The appeal was reheard by Mr. Ross, on 1st February 1922 and dismissed with costs.

The plaintiffs appeal to this Court and two grounds have been urged on their behalf: first, that the order passed by Mr. Ross on 20th August 1921, vacating the entire judgment of Mr. Carter and ordering a rehearing of the whole appeal was passed without jurisdiction and was erroneous in law. On this point reference has been made to O. 41, R. 4, and we are asked to hold that on the date on which Mr. Carter delivered his judgment the appeal was not incompetent nor was the order passed by the Judge liable to be set aside, the grounds of appeal being common to all the appellants. The appellants are joint landlords. They served the tenant with notice to quit and on the expiration of the time provided in the notice brought the suit for ejectment. The fact that one of the landlords died since the institution of the appeal would not affect the right of the others to get a decree in ejectment and in support of this reference has been made to the case of Dwarka Nath Roy v. Kali Sankar Roy (1). We think that there is great force in this argument. But it is not necessary for the purposes of this case to consider this matter more minutely for on the second ground that the appellants have taken, we are of opinion that they are entitled to succeed. That ground is that on the findings of the Courts below the defendant was a tenant-at-will and his tenancy has been determined by a notice to quit presumably under S. 106, T. P. Act irrespective of the fact that he did or did not do any act in contravention of the terms of the contract determining the tenancy and so he was liable to be ejected. The second issue framed by the learned Munsif was as follows:

Is the defendant a tenant-at-will under the plaintiff?

In disposing of that issue the learned Munsif observed that this issue was raised owing to the defendant claiming a right of occupancy in respect of the tank and he held that the parties were bound by the Transfer of Property Act, and that the provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Act did not apply. Mr. Ross in appeal has considered this finding of the Munsif as a finding that the defendant was a tenant-at-will. He observed:

The respondent raised the issue whether he was a tenant-at-will, whether a notice to quit was served on him and whether he injured the tank by any act contrary to the terms of the kabuliyat. The Munsif found for the plaintiffs on the two first issues and I think rightly.

We have, therefore, the finding of the learned Judge of the Court of first appeal that the defendant was a tenant-at-will. It has been found by the learned Munsif and that finding has not been displaced by the Judge, that the notice to quit was duly served upon the defendant. The only objection, therefore, that may be urged in defence is that there is a contract between the parties to take the case out of the operation of S. 106, T. P. Act. The learned vakil for the respondent contends that as the defendant reared fish in the tank and did not commit any act likely to injure the tank or pollute the water of the tank, it should be presumed that the contract between the parties was that so long as the respondent carried out the terms of the contract he would not be liable to be ejected. If this contention prevails, the defendant must be taken to have acquired a permanent tenancy in the tank so long as he does not commit any act contrary to the contract. We do not think that that was the intention of the parties. There is no other term in the kabuliyat which will stand in the way of the plaintiff landlords determining the tenancy by a proper notice. We think that on this finding the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed.

The result is that the decree of the Court below is set aside and the plaintiff's suit, in so far as it claims recovery of possession from the defendant by ejecting him from the tank, is decreed. Since we have held that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed in ejectment by virtue of the determination of the tenancy of the defendant under S. 106, T. P. Act., they are not entitled to any compensation in the suit. That part of the claim is dismissed. The plaintiffs will be entitled to get proportionate costs in all the Courts.

* Criminal P. C., S. 476-B—There is only one appeal from the decision on an application for making complaint.

The policy of the law, as laid down in 'S. 476-B' is this that, whenever there is a decision by a Court upon an application that a complaint shall be made, whether that decision be one way or another, there is one appeal from it and no more than one appeal. It matters nothing whatever what the result of the appeal may be. If any particular person is for the first time ordered to be prosecuted by the superior Court, his remedy after that is to take his defence before a jury or Magistrate, according to the nature of the case. Two Courts, and only two are to deal with this preliminary question as to whether a person shall be prosecuted or not: A. I. R. 1924 Bom. 347 and *A. I. R. 1925 Lah. 322, Foll. : A. I. Rankin, C. J.—This is an appeal from an order, dated 5th March 1927, and made by the District Judge of Chhittagong under S. 476-B, Criminal P. C. It appears that the appellant was a tenant to and tahsildar of a certain party. He, in the course of his duty, appears to have collected rents due to his masters and there was certain litigation between the parties. In 1924 the masters brought certain rent suits for arrears in respect of the years 1920 to 1923 against the present appellant and his cosharers. He pleaded full payment as regards the rent of 1920 and part payment as regards the later years, and on this latter point he supported his case by producing two dakhilas, Ex. A and Ex. A-1. It is said that Ex. A is a dakhila emanating from the sudder cutchery and Ex. A-1 was given by one Mahendra under orders of the sudder cutchery. Be that as it may, the Munsif, in whose Court the suit was brought, decreed the rent suit in full and appears to have made an observation that the dakhilas were suspicious. Thereupon the plaintiffs in the case made an application to the Munsif under S. 476, Criminal P. C., asking him to take steps by making a complaint to institute prosecution of the present appellant for producing in evidence these documents known by him to be false; in other words, for perjury and forgery. The case itself—the rent suit—went on appeal to the District Judge, but the Munsif's finding was affirmed on 10th July 1926. Thereupon the petition asking the Munsif to make a complaint to the Magistrate was revived and a miscellaneous case was started and the parties commenced to contest the question whether the Munsif's Court ought not to make a complaint against the present appellant. How far they contested it on the merits is doubtful, because it would appear that in the end, on 4th December 1926, the application of the plaintiffs-landlords was dismissed for default. Taking that order of dismissal for default as being, in the words of S. 476-B, a refusal to make a complaint, the plaintiffs-landlords appealed against it to the District Judge who, on 5th March 1927, made the order against which the present appeal is brought. By his order the learned District Judge gives certain reasons which appear to him to amount to good prima facie proof that the dakhilas were forgeries. He goes into the questions of the counterfoils, the numbers of the counterfoils and so on. He comes to the conclusion that there is a good prima facie case, not only that they were forgeries, but that the present appellant used them knowing them to be forgeries.

In the present appeal the first question that arises is whether, in a case like this, an appeal lies to the High Court or not. That question depends upon the words of S. 476-B, Criminal P. C. What is said is that, in a case where the first Court, in dealing with an application to lodge a complaint, refuses to lodge a complaint, and an appeal is taken to a superior Court which decides to make a complaint there is a further right of appeal from that; because S. 476-B, having operated to give an appeal from the order of the first Court dealing with the matter, operates all over again when the second Court decides that a complaint should be made. Mr. Fazlul Haq, the learned Advocate who appears for the appellant, does not contend that, if in such a case as this the superior Court had dismissed the appeal, thereby refusing to make a complaint and agreeing with the Court below from such an order, a right of appeal to the High Court would lie. He contends that it makes all the difference that the order of the superior Court was an order which for the first time amounted to the making of a complaint. He agrees, too, that if in the first Court a complaint had been made and on appeal the appeal had been dismissed, no further appeal would lie to this Court. He contends that in the particular case, where the first Court having refused to make a complaint a superior Court differs and does for the first time make a complaint then S. 476-B operates to give what is in effect a second appeal. There is some authority upon this question and it is very important that the matter should be rightly decided. The question is whether the intention of the legislature was to give one appeal from every decision upon an application for an order that a complaint shall be made, or whether the intention of the Code is not merely to give that right, but in addition to give a right to one appeal from every order directing a complaint.

In my judgment it is desirable to refer to three cases in which this matter has been dealt with. The first case to which I would refer is the case of Somabhai Valabh Bhai v. Aditbhai Parshottam (1). That case was one in which a Subordinate Judge decided to make a complaint. The language used by the Subordinate Court was language applicable to the old Code, but in fact the first Court decided to make a complaint. On appeal the superior Court, namely, the Sessions Judge, reversed that order and recalled the complaint. Thereupon an appeal was brought to the High Court and the decision of Macleod, C. J., and Shah, J., was to the following effect :

From that order in effect directing withdrawal of the complaint the petitioner has filed an appeal. The first question is whether the appeal lies. We are clearly of opinion that no appeal lies under the provisions of the Code against an order made by the Court to which the Court making a complaint is subordinate.

It is quite true that in that particular case the superior Court had refused to make a complaint and had set aside the order directing a complaint to be made. The learned Judges do not seem to me to proceed upon that all. They proceed, I think, upon the principle that, on the true construction of S. 476-B, there is no provision for a second appeal; there is no provision for an appeal to be taken from the order made by the superior Court.

The next case to which I would refer is the case of Muhammad Idris v. Emperor (2). In that case there had been a Subordinate Judge's order refusing to make a complaint and there had been an appellate order under S. 476-B directing a complaint to be made, so that it was a case exactly on all fours with the present case; and when an appeal was taken to the High Court of Lahore the matter was referred to a Bench for decision. The appellate Bench decided in this way :

The question referred to us in this appeal and in Appeals Nos. 233 and 236 of 1924 is whether an appeal lies to this Court from an appellate order of the District Judge making a complaint which the Subordinate Judge might himself have made under S. 476, Criminal P. C. S. 476-B of the Code gives a right of appeal only when a Court has made or refused to make a complaint under S. 476 or S. 476-A, and neither of those sections relates to a complaint made by a Court on appeal from an order of a Subordinate Court refusing to make a complaint.

It appears to me, therefore, that the High Court of Lahore has proceeded upon the same principle as the High Court of Bombay, namely, that under S. 476-B there is evidently an intention to give one appeal from the decision of the first Court which deals with an application that a complaint should be made. Whether the appeal results in granting the application or refusing the application, there is one appeal, and only one appeal, provided for by S. 476-B.

The case, however, in which the matter has been most fully discussed is a case which is in favour of the present appellant. That is the case of Ranjit Narain Singh v. Rambahadur Singh (3). The learned Judges there take the view that if the superior Court acting under S. 476-B decides in a particular way or for the first time decides to make a complaint which the lower Court has refused to make then the section having once operated proceeds to operate all over again because the order made by the superior Court in such a case is itself an order making a complaint; and, therefore, an order making a complaint having been made, and made for the first time, S. 476-B has a second lease of life and operates upon that to give in effect a second appeal. In so deciding the learned Judges appear to have been in agreement with a previous case decided by Mr. Justice Mullick, in the same High Court but which is not, so far as I know, reported. They do, however, cite in full for the present purpose the dicta of Mr. Justice Mullick and it appears that an application was made to a Sub-Deputy Collector to make a complaint against one Faijdar Rai directing his prosecution for the offences of using a forged document and giving false evidence. The Sub-Deputy Collector refused to take any action. The complainant appealed to the Collector under S. 476-B. The Collector disagreed with the Sub-Deputy Collector's view and himself made a complaint. Thereupon Faijdar Rai appealed to the Divisional Commissioner by way of second appeal and the Divisional Commissioner held that no such appeal was competent. The matter came to the High Court before Mr. Justice Mullick and he took the view that the second appeal to the Commissioner was competent. The reasons which he gives are as follows :

(2) A. I. R. 1925 Lah. 322=6 Lah. 56.

• (1) A. I. R. 1924 Bom. 347=48 Bom. 401.

Section 476-B, Criminal P. C., appears to contemplate that, if an appellate Court sets aside the order of the original Court, the party prejudicially affected has a right of appeal to the Court to which appeals from that appellate Court ordinarily lie.

The view taken by Mr Justice Mullick was, so far as I can see, not that it depended upon whether the superior Court decided to make a complaint or decided for the first time to make a complaint, but merely upon whether the appellate Court set aside the order of the original Court. In Ranjit Narain Singh v. Rambahadur Singh (3), that was not the view which the appellate Bench appears to have adopted. The view that it adopted is this : that if an order for a complaint to be made is made by the first Court and upheld by the second Court no further appeal lies, but if such an order is refused by the first Court and a complaint is made by the second Court, then an appeal lies, not by reason of any express provision to that effect at the end of S. 476-B, but by reason that the section operates upon the same subject-matter over again, this being a complaint within the meaning of the opening words of the section.

In my judgment it is unsound to hold on the language of S. 476-B that any such distinction was intended. S. 476-B gives a right of appeal first to a person aggrieved because any civil, revenue or criminal Court has refused to make a complaint. It also gives it to any person against whom such a complaint has been made ; and if this section is to operate upon the same subject-matter twice, so as in effect to produce more than one appeal from the first decision upon an application to direct a prosecution I think it applies indifferently whether the effect of the second Court's order is to make a complaint or to refuse to make a complaint. In the present case now before us the Munsif refused to make a complaint. The only meaning of the appeal to the District Judge was to ask him to make a complaint. It was in his discretion to make a complaint or not to make a complaint. If he had refused to make a complaint and upheld the order of the Munsif I fail to see why he would not have been as much within the opening words of the section as he was when he decided to differ from the Munsif, and to make a complaint. It seems to me to be erroneous to say that if he makes a complaint he does so not under S. 476-B but under S. 476, but while if he refuses to make a complaint under S. 476 he does so under S. 476-B. S. 476 applies, in the case of a "superior Court," i. e. a Court superior to the Court in which the offence took place only after a complaint is made under an authority not given by the section. S. 476-B applies to a complaint made or refused by a Court acting under the authority conferred upon it by S. 476 or S. 476-A. Hence the words used are "has refused to make a complaint under S. 476 or S. 476-A etc." The reference to S. 476 is in almost identical terms at the conclusion of Ss. 476-A and 476-B and had the legislature intended to produce the result now contended for on behalf of the appellant it would have provided specifically for an appeal when a complaint is made by a Court acting under the powers conferred by S. 476-B.

Prima facie S. 476-B deals first of all with a Court and then with the Court to which the former Court is subordinate which is called the superior Court. In my judgment it is a misconstruction of the section to suppose that when the superior Court has acted under the section and the section has taken its effect the same matter is to be subjected for the second time to a process exactly of the same character with the result that one provision in general terms for an appeal operates twice.

It has been pointed out to us that under S. 476-A, if this matter had not been canvassed in the Munsif's Court at all, the District Judge might have made an order that a complaint should issue. In that case he would have been dealing with the matter for the first time and it is clear on the terms S. 476-B that an appeal would have lain from his decision. It is important to point out that an appeal would lie from his decision equally whether he refused to make a complaint under S. 476-A or whether he made a complaint under S. 476. There would be no difference at all according to the result or the nature of his order. There would be one appeal from the Court which dealt with the matter for the first time. I fail altogether to see how this shows it to be correct to construe S. 476-B as though it were intended to take operation upon the same case twice over.

It has been suggested that the language at the end of the section assists the appellant's case, namely, the wording where it is said that if the superior Court makes such complaint the provisions of S. 476 shall apply to the complaint. That is quite clear and necessary. The accused can be sent in custody to a Magistrate. The superior Court in such a case can bind over any person to give evidence before a Magistrate. The Magistrate must proceed according to law and so forth. There can be no doubt that S. 476 must apply. But, as I ventured to point out in the course of the argument, that is a very different thing from saying that S. 476-B must apply all over again.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the policy of the law as laid down in S. 476-B, is this: that whenever there is a decision by a Court upon an application that a complaint shall be made—whether that decision be one way or another—there is one appeal from it and no more than one appeal. It matters nothing whatever what the result of the appeal may be. If any particular person is for the first time ordered to be prosecuted by the superior Court his remedy after that is to take his defence before a jury or a Magistrate according to the nature of the case. Two Courts and only two are to deal with this preliminary question as to whether a person shall be prosecuted or not. If the second Court is against the present accused he must look to the jury for his safety.

This being a proceeding in a civil case a Rule has been obtained under S. 115, Civil P. C., asking us to interfere with the order made and the learned advocate for the appellant asks us upon this rule to take action because he says that the learned Judge's order is not a proper complaint and that he has not recorded a finding that it is expedient in the interest of justice that the appellant should be prosecuted. When we come to look at what is absolutely required by the Criminal Procedure Code it does not seem to be illegal to deal with the matter as the learned District Judge has done. Having given his reasons holding that there is a good prima facie case he says:

I, therefore, direct the prosecution of Ahamadar Rahaman. Let a copy of this order be sent along with the records to the proper Magistrate as a complaint.

That seems to me to be sufficient under the Criminal Procedure Code. In some cases a more formal and fuller document may be required, but in this case I am not prepared to hold that it is not a good complaint. The learned Judge says: "I direct the prosecution of Ahamadar Rahaman." It is true that he has not used the exact words of S. 476 as indeed he should have been done; but in my judgment there can be no doubt that he has come to the conclusion that it is expedient in the interest of justice. After all the question is whether or not this man used forged documents knowing them to be forged documents and gave evidence which was perjured evidence before a Court of law. If it appeared to the learned Judge that there was a prima facie case against him of that character, then in the absence of very special circumstances it would be in the public interest that that matter should be investigated before a competent Magistrate.

In my judgment, therefore, the appeal fails and must be dismissed and the Rule must be discharged.

Hindu Law—Joint family—Absolute bequest to widow—Widow bequeathing the property to her son—Son gets it as personal property.

Hemendra Nath Sen and Gopendra Nath—for Appellants.Tarakeswar Pal Chowdhury and Jitenra Mohan Banerjee—for Respondents.

Mallik, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit for recovery of the plaintiffs' dues amounting to Rs. 1,110-8-0 on a mortgage bond executed by the father of the defendants, one Luski Shaha, in favour of the plaintiffs. The defence was that the defendants and their father were members of a joint Hindu family governed by the Mitakshara law, that the mortgaged property was the paternal property of the defendants' father and the defendants had a vested right therein, and that Luski Shaha, therefore, had no right to create a mortgage alone on the property in excess of his own share. The trial Judge held that the mortgaged property was the paternal property of Luski and that the defendants had a vested right therein. He held also that there was an antecedent debt of Rs. 335 which has paid off with the consideration money received by Luski for the bond in suit and that the mortgaged property was liable for satisfaction of that amount only; and on these findings the trial Judge decreed the plaintiff's suit in part. On appeal by the plaintiffs the learned District Judge came to the conclusion that the mortgaged property was not ancestral, but the personal property of Luski and so his sons; the defendants had no vested right therein; and on this finding the lower appellate Court gave a full decree to the plaintiffs. The defendants have appealed to this Court.

There were two points taken before us: firstly it was said that the lower appellate Court was wrong in giving a full decree to the plaintiffs as by doing that it allowed to the plaintiff more than what the plaintiffs had asked for in their appeal; and secondly, it was contended that the learned District Judge was in error when he came to the conclusion that the mortgaged property was not ancestral but only the personal property of Luski.

The first point, which is a short one, can be disposed of quickly. The contention of the learned advocate on this point was that when the lower appellate Court gave a full decree to the plaintiffs it allowed them by that decree Rs. 775-8-0 (Rs. 1110-8-0, the total amount claimed, minus Rs. 335, the amount of the antecedent debt), whereas the plaintiffs had valued their appeal at Rs. 559-2-0 only. This contention of the learned advocate was obviously based on misconception and a misreading of the order passed by the trial Judge. The trial Judge, it is true, found that the amount of the antecedent debt was Rs. 335 only. But in the decree that he made in favour of the plaintiffs he allowed the plaintiffs not only Rs. 335, but the interest as well on that amount calculated at the rate in the bond. If the total of Rs. 335 and the interest thus calculated would be deducted from the total amount claimed, Rs. 1,110-8-0, there would (sic) a balance of Rs. 559-2-0, the amount at which the plaintiffs had valued their appeal.

The second contention is much more important and practically the whole controversy before us has been over it and over the question whether the property was ancestral or Luski's personal property. There is no dispute that the property was originally the self-acquired property of Luski's father Bangali. It appears that Bangali Saha bequeathed this property to his widow Methrani Dasi by executing a will in her favour and Methrani in her turn made a bequest of it to Luski Shaha by executing another will in favour of Luski. The learned advocate for the appellants contended that the property when it came to Luski became his ancestral property inasmuch as it had been at one time the property of his father Bangali: and in support of this contention he cited the case of Muddun Gopal v. Ram Buksh (1). This case however, does not appear to me to go very much in support of the learned Advocate's contention. All that was held in that 6 W. R. case was that landed property acquired by a Mitakshara father and distributed by him amongst his sons does not by such gift become the self-acquired property of the sons. It does not lay down that a property which goes to a Mitakshara son becomes his ancestral property simply for the reason that it had at one time belonged to his father, no matter how the property goes to the son, whether direct from the father or after having passed through several hands in the interval. The learned advocate contended that the deviation from a direct descent of the property from Bangali to Luski in the present case was of no consequence and for that purpose he placed reliance upon the case of Beni Pershad v. Puran Chand (2). But that case is clearly distinguishable from the case before us. In that case a Hindu governed by the Mitakshara law assigned an ancestral mauza to his widow in lieu of her maintenance. After the death of the widow the property devolved on the grandsons and in a subsequent litigation over the property it was held that the mauza retained the character of ancestral property during the lifetime of the widow. But in that case the interest of the widow that was created by the assignment in her favour, was of a temporary nature and only a limited one, whereas in the present case there was no limitation of any kind imposed on the interest which Methrani acquired under the will and the will which Bangali executed in Methrani's favour made Methrani Dasi the absolute owner of the property. The authorities which the learned advocate cited before us do not, therefore, in my opinion go in support of the contention urged by him. The question whether a property is ancestral or self-acquired has been very well stated in West and Buhler, Book 2, Introduction, p 19 :

Ancestral property, as amongst descendants, comprises property transmitted in the direct male heir 'from a common ancestor, and accretions to such property made with the aid of the inherited ancestral estate.' Thus in the case of a father, head of a family, property inherited from his father or grandfather, is ancestral property, however acquired by its previous possessors. On the other hand property inherited by him from females, brothers or collaterals, or directly from a great-grandfather, appears to be subject to the same rules as if self-acquired. Ancestral property, in fact, may be said to be co-extensive with the objects of apratibandha daya or unobstructed inheritance.

This view agrees with the view arrived at by Jagannath and it is the view of Jagannath that represents the Bengal opinion. In the present case the property before it came to Luski, had, it is true, at one time belonged to his father Bangali. But it was not transmitted to Luski in a direct line. It came to him not even by inheritance from a female, his mother, but by a bequest made by her and it was by no means apratibandha daya or unobstructed inheritance inasmuch as it could not have come to Luski at all had there been no will executed by Methrani Dasi in Luski's favour. I am, therefore, of opinion that the learned District Judge was right when he held that the property was not ancestral, but the personal property of Luski Saha.

In view of the aforesaid observation the appeal must fail. It is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Privy Council Appeals Nos. 118 to 164 of 1923, Decided on 24th August 1923, from appellate decrees in Appeals Nos. 417, 418, 420 to 423, 426, 427, 429 to 432, 435 to 438, 440 to 442, 446, 448 to 451, 455 to 462, 464 to 467, 471, 473, 476 to 478, 480 to 482, 483 and 485 of 1920.

(a) Civil P. C., O. 32, R. 3—Subsequent to the admission of appeal to Privy Council Deputy Registrar of High Court should not act for the minor respondent. (Obiter)

(Obiter) While it is in accordance with the practice that in default of any more suitable next friend or guardian, the Deputy Registrar should be appointed for the purpose of the proceedings in the High Court for obtaining leave to appeal to Privy Council and so forth, upon the final admission of the appeal the Deputy Registrar ceases to act any further as guardian for the minors. It is not the practice of the Calcutta High Court that the Deputy Registrar of the Court should act any further on behalf of the minors in cases which go to the Privy Council.

Jatindra Nath Sanyal — for minor Respondents.

Rankin, C. J.—This is an application in connexion with a batch of 47 appeals now pending before His Majesty in Council. The Privy Council numbers are 118 to 164 of 1923. The appeals arise out of certain settlement proceedings under the Bengal Tenancy Act and they raise a question between the appellant to England and various tenants of his as to the right of the appellant to an enhancement of rent. The High Court decided against the appellant and his application for leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council was filed on 10th December 1923.

It appears that when the cases were before this Court the Deputy Registrar was representing the interest of certain minors among the tenants, and for the purpose of the application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council there was an order made on 8th February 1924 that the Deputy Registrar should continue to represent the minors when he represented in the High Court appeals, and certain provision was made for his costs. A certificate that the cases were fit to be taken on appeal was granted by this Court on 8th June 1925 and the appeals were finally admitted on 27th July 1925; since that time the record has been printed in India and has lately been forwarded to England.

Now, the practice of this Court with reference to minors in cases of appeals to the Privy Council is as follows : By Rr. 41 and 42 of Ch. 6 of the High Court Rules on the appellate side it is provided that all applications by, or on behalf of, an infant shall be made in the name of the infant by the person whose name is on the record as his next friend or guardian ; and whenever any application is consented to, or opposed by, an infant, the infant shall in like manner be represented by the person who appears on the record as his next friend or guardian.

Rule 42 says :

In cases where there is no next friend or guardian upon the record, a separate application for appointment of a next friend or guardian must be made.

Now, while it is in accordance with the practice that in default of any more suitable next friend or guardian, the Deputy Registrar should be appointed for the purpose of the proceedings in this Court for obtaining leave to appeal and so forth, upon the final admission of the appeal, the Deputy Registrar ceases to act any further as guardian for the minors. It is not our practice that the Deputy Registrar of the Court should act any further on behalf of the minors in cases which go to the Privy Council. Accordingly, on 26th August 1925, an application for appointment of a guardian having been made, the gentleman, whose application is now before us, Babu Jatindra Nath Sanyal, was appointed guardian ad litem for the minor respondents to England. It appears that out of these 47 appeals there are ten in which this gentleman has been appointed guardian for minor respondents. The numbers of the ten appeals are as follows : 127, 131, 132, 141, 148, 152, 155, 156, 158 and 163.

We are now concerned with an application made by Mr. Sanyal as guardian asking us to order the appellant to put him in funds to have these cases argued on behalf of the minors by a solicitor and junior counsel before the Judicial Committee. Some estimate has been obtained from the agent in England as to the amount of money which would be required for this purpose and it appears that £ 300 or £ 400 would apparently be necessary, considering that the paper-book is very large and that there would be a good deal of work connected with the case. In these circumstances I find that no such order in connexion with Privy Council appeals has ever been made by this Court hitherto. I am not sure whether any such order has ever been asked for hitherto, and it is necessary very carefully to consider by what right and on what principle such an order could be made by this Court. No doubt, in ordinary cases before the Courts in India under the Civil Procedure Code, it would be quite an ordinary practice to direct that the plaintiff in a suit should put the guardian ad litem in funds to a certain extent for the defence of the minor defendants; but we are here exercising a jurisdiction of a very special character. Certain rules have been made under statutory powers by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Under those rules certain duties are cast upon the Courts in India in connexion with appeals to His Majesty in Council. The Indian Legislature by the Civil Procedure Code, particularly by O. 14, has commissioned the Courts in India to carry out the duties that are imposed by the rules made by the Judicial Committee, but unless we can find that there is express authority given to this Court to make order as is now asked in connexion with an appeal to His Majesty in Council which has been finally admitted and is before His Majesty in Council at the present moment it is not plain to me that we can have any right to do so.

It may or may not be that such an order could be obtained from the Judicial Committee, but our right to make such an order must be granted by an express provision. I have been through the relevant sections of the Civil Procedure Code, O. 45. I have been through the rules made by the Judicial Committee called the Judicial Committee Rules of 1908 and also through the order in Council which came into operation in January 1921 and was made on 9th February 1920. I have failed to find in any of these rules a provision that would entitle us to take upon ourselves to make such an order as is asked for. The question is no longer one of the proceedings before this Court. Proceedings before this Court have terminated and the whole matter is before the Judicial Committee. In this connexion it is noticeable that under R. 13 of the provisions made by the Privy Council for Indian appeals, where at any time between the admission of an appeal and the dispatch of the record to England, the record becomes defective by reason of the death or change of status of a party to the appeal, the Court, on an application, may grant a certificate showing who, in the opinion of the Court, is the proper person to be substituted or entered on the record in place of, or in addition to, the party who has died or undergone a change of status; so that in such a case all that this Court can do is to grant a certificate. In that case the name of such person shall be deemed to be so substituted or entered on the record without express order of His Majesty in Council. On the other hand, by R. 14, where an appeal becomes defective subsequently to the dispatch of the record to England the Court may cause a certificate to be transmitted to the Registrar of the Privy Council showing who, in the opinion of the Court, is the proper person to be substituted; and there the matter stops so far as this Court is concerned. In my opinion, any order such as is herein asked for would be assuming a jurisdiction of a character which is materially different from anything that can be justified by the rules which govern Courts in India. It is, however, right to say that in the present case it does not appear to me that the order asked for would be an order which it would be either reasonable or in the interest of the minors to make.

As I understand the matter, the minors in the ten appeals in question are concerned in resisting the claim of the landlord to a certain enhancement of rent. It appears in the present case that out of all the respondents who are sui juris no one appears to be entering appearance or defending the case upon appeal to His Majesty in Council. No doubt that attitude is adopted with a quite intelligent appreciation of the interest of the parties. It is quite clear that if we were to make an order upon the appellant directing him to put the applicant in funds of £400, apart from any question of hardship upon the appellant who has given Rs. 6,000 security for costs for all these appeals already, the result upon the interest of the minors might well be disastrous. If by any chance the appeals also were to succeed with the result that the minor respondents became chargeable for such a large sum as their own costs in the appeals the result would probably be that the whole of their interest in the tenancies would be sold and they would be deprived probably of their means of life. On the other hand, if the appeals should succeed ex-parte the result would presumably be that there would be a certain enhancement of rent and it by no means follows that the Privy Council would direct them to pay any costs which in all the circumstances it would be inequitable or unjust that they should pay. I am not in the least satisfied that even if this Court had the power to make such an order as is asked for it would be in the interest of the minor respondents that the order should be made. On the contrary, it appears to me that on the question of interest the common-sense of the matter is that the attitude adopted by those respondents who are sui juris is an indication of the fact that it is better that the appeals should be heard ex parte on points of law and that the order asked for should not be made. This is a matter of first impression and I have thought it necessary to explain in detail the position.

The application, therefore, must be refused. There will be no order as to costs.

Appeal No. 54 of 1925, Decided on 4th January 1928, from original decree of Sub-Judge, Krishnagar, D/- 28th January 1925.

(a) Hindu Law — Succession — Bandhus — One offering greatest spiritual benefit is preferred.

Where the parties are related in the same degree, the preferential right should be in him who confers the greatest spiritual benefit on the deceased : 19 Mad. 405 (P.C.), Foll. [P 292 C 1]

(b) Hindu Law — Succession — Test about "nearness of blood" laid down.

According to the Mitakshara and the Viramirodaya, in doubtful cases the rule as to how it should be determined that a person has more blood particles in common with the propositus is that it should be decided in accordance with the efficacy of oblations offered to the ancestors. [P 293 C 1]

(c) Hindu Law — Succession — Distinction between full and half blood should be restricted to cases mentioned in texts.

Where the text writers meant that there should be a difference between the relations of full blood and half blood, that was specially enumerated. B. B. Ghose, J.—This appeal is by the plaintiff for recovery of possession of certain properties on the allegation that he is the preferential heir of the last male owner and is, therefore, entitled to succeed to the properties as the next reversioner. The properties originally belonged to one Rameswar Ray who died on the 6th June 1882 leaving a widow Mankumari Barmanya pregnant with child. She gave birth to a posthumous son on the 31st December 1882. That son died on the 7th March 1883, leaving his mother Mankumari as his sole heir. This lady was in possession of a Hindu widow's estate till her death on the 5th June 1916. A controversy then arose as to whether the plaintiff and his two brothers, pro-forma defendants 3 and 4, were the preferential heirs or the defendants. The two parties are related in this way : the plaintiff and his brothers are the mother's sister's sons of the infant who was the last male owner, the propositus. The defendants are the sons of the father's half-sister of the propositus. The properties are partly debuttar and partly secular and the title to possession is the same both with regard to the debuttar and secular properties. Nothing turns upon the nature of the properties in the decision of the case. The point in controversy is a rather vexed one as to the preferential right of atma bandhus in the same degree to succeed to the properties of a deceased person under the Mitakshara which governs the parties in the case as found by the Subordinate Judge. There is no question before us that the parties are governed by the Mitakshara. The only question that was argued is whether the mother's sister's sons are to be preferred to the father's half-sister's sons. The Subordinate Judge has decided the question in favour of the defendants and has held that the mother's sister's sons should be postponed to the father's half-sister's sons. The plaintiff alleges that his two brothers have taken their shares and have, therefore, refused to join him as plaintiffs, and his claim is only to a one-third share in the properties. The question in controversy was raised in the second issue as framed by the Subordinate Judge, namely, as to whether or not the plaintiff is the preferential heir of the deceased infant, son of Rameswar Ray. The Subordinate Judge, after considering the various cases cited before him on the point, came to his conclusion. It is unnecessary for me to repeat the grounds on which the Subordinate Judge held in favour of the defendants, as the questions argued before us will be stated by me in detail.

It is argued on behalf of the appellant that the fact that the defendants are related through the father does not give them a preferential right; nor is the fact that the text in the Mitakshara mentions atma bandhus related through the father first as in the line of heirs, decisive on the question, because the order in which the names are given is not the guiding factor in deciding which of the heirs should be preferred. The list of bandhus is enumerated in the Mitakshara, Ch. 2, S. 6, verses 1 and 2, which are as follows:

(1) On failure of gentiles, the cognates are heirs. The cognates are of three kinds; related to the person himself, to his father, or to his mother; as is declared by the following text: "the sons of his own father's sister, the sons of his own mother's sister, and the sons of his own maternal uncle must be considered as his own cognate kindred".....(2) Here by reason of near affinity the cognate kindred of the deceased himself are his successors in the first instance; on failure of them, his father's cognate kindred; or, there being none, his mothers' cognate kindred. This must be understood to be the order of succession here intended.

The question as to the precedence of atma bandhus standing in the same degree of relationship to a deceased person has been the subject of discussion in many decisions of the different High Courts where the Mitakshara law prevails; and it must be admitted that there is a good deal of divergence of opinion among the various High Courts as to the principle which should guide the Courts in coming to a conclusion with regard to the question, and the Madras High Court is divided against itself with regard to the question. It has been held in several cases that bandhus related through the father should be preferred to those related through the mother, and those whose relationship to the deceased is intervened by two females are to be postponed to those whose relationship is intervened by one female. In some cases it has been held that precedence must be in accordance with the order in which the atma bandhus are enumerated in the text, that is to say, the son of the deceased's own father's sister must come before the son of his own mother's sister; and this principle is sought to be supported by the rule of interpretation enunciated in Jaimini's Nyayamala. The principle first stated is laid down in some of the Madras cases of which I may cite Sundrammal v. Rangasami Mudaliar (1) and Balusami Pandithar v. Narayana Rau (2). The second principle which I have stated above is laid down in the case of Appandai Vathiyar v. Bagubali Mudaliyar (3). But in the last case the principle enunciated in the previous cases was dissented from; and this last case was again dissented from in a later case of P. Rami Reddi v. Gangi Reddi (4).

Turning to the Allahabad High Court: we find that the rule that the order of precedence should be followed in accordance with the order in which the atma bandhus are named in the text was not accepted. But it was laid down in the case of Ram Charan Lal v. Rahim Baksh (5) that bandhus connected through the father are to be preferred to those connected through the mother. In Bombay it was laid down in the case of Saguna v. Sadas Shiv (6) that, according to Mitakshara, those connected through the male line among the bandhus are to be preferred to those connected through the females. The rule that a bandhu connected with the propositus through one more female than another should be postponed to that other was not followed in the case of Rajappa v. Gangappa (7). Then again the question was debated at considerable length by a Full Bench of the Patna High Court in the case of Umashankar Prasad v. Mt. Nageswari Koer (8). But the learned Judges composing the Bench give different reasons for their conclusion and there is no unanimity as to the principle to be followed in giving preference to one set of atma bandhus to another set.

In this state of judicial decisions in the Courts in India one would try to find if any certain direction can be obtained from any decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The case of Vedachela Mudaliar v. Subramania Mudaliar (9) was relied upon on behalf of the appellant in support of the proposition that an atma bandhu related through the father has no preferential right to claim succession to the property of a deceased as against one connected through the mother. On behalf of the respondents it has been contended that, although there are certain expressions in the judgment which might support the contention urged on behalf of the appellant by Dr. Bijon Kumar Mukerjee, those observations are really obiter, and should not be taken as authorities as compelling us to accept the proposition that is sought to be drawn from the observations in the judgment. It is, therefore, necessary to examine the case in some detail. The controversy in that case was between the maternal uncle and the son of a paternal aunt's son and their Lordships held that the maternal uncle succeeded in preference to a son of the paternal aunt's son. At p. 359 of the Report their Lordships made the following observations :

For instance, among atma bandhus enumerated, the name of the father's sister's son is first given ; then comes the mother's sister's son ; and after him, the son of the mother's brother. Similarly among specifically named (pitri) pitri bandhus, first comes the son of the father's paternal aunt and among (matri) matri-bandhus the son of the mother's paternal aunt. From this it has been inferred that the expounder of the rule in question intended that each class should be divided into two sub-classes according to the side of relationship and that in every case preference should be given to the father's side. Their Lordships, again, in the view they take of the rights of the parties in the present case do not think it necessary to express an opinion how far this proposition is in conformity with the express rule that in each class propinquity should be the guiding factor. Assuming, however, the inference to be well founded the question arises: What is the place of the mother's brother among atma bandhus ?

From this passage it would appear that their Lordships did not desire to lay down any definite rule as to whether those related through the father's side should be given preference or not. But later on, while discussing the case Vedachela v. Subramania (9) already cited, their Lordships observe at p. 363:

And then comes the passage on which the Judges in Balusami v. Narayana (2) relied in their division of atma bandhus into two sub-classes—namely, ex-parte paterna and ex-parte materna. That passage runs thus :

"Nor could it be urged here that the mother being nearer than the father, the matri-bandhus take the wealth before the pitri bandhus. From the text, 'of these the mother is more important than the father ; (2) mother's precedence alone is stated and not that of the mother's bandhus ; therefore, we think it sound that the matri-bandhus should take the wealth only after the pitri-bandhus'

A very small consideration would show that that passage has nothing to do with the members of the same class inter se. It only explains why pitri-bandhus are to be preferred to matri-bandhus. The mother's position being special to herself under an express rule.

This passage has been taken as having disapproved the rule laid down in the two Madras cases : Sundrammal v. Rangasami (1) and Balusami v. Narayana (2), so far as they lay down that among bandhus of the same class those ex parte paterna are to be preferred to those ex-parte materna. I have already pointed out that in the previous part of the judgment their Lordships said that it was unnecessary to express any opinion on that point. The difficulty as to what has been decided by their Lordships of the Privy Council in this case with reference to the general principle in debate is further enhanced by the fact that their Lordships themselves referred in a later case, Kenchava v. Girimallappa (10), as to what has been decided in the case of Vedachela v. Subramania (9) Their Lordships observe [at p. 376 of 51 I. A.] :

The question of priority as between atma-bandhus ex-parte paterna and those ex-parte materna has been the subject of much discussion, the latest, word on the subject being found in Vedachela Mudaliar v. Subramania Mudaliar (9), which decided in 1921, that as between pitri-bandhus and matri bandhus, the preference given to the former is settled.

It may be pointed out that in Vedachela's case (9) the question as to priority as between pitri-bandhus and matri-bandhus was not disputed. It was admitted in that case that the parties in controversy were both related to the deceased as atma bandhus. But there can be no question that as between pitri-bandhus and matri-bandhus pitri-bandhus are entitled to priority. The question, therefore, as to the priority of atma bandhus, who are related through the father, and those who are related through the mother, seems to have been left in as much obscurity with reference to the general principle enunciated in the cases I have cited, as before. I do not think, having regard to the divergence of judicial opinion, that I should hazard an attempt to lay down any general principle with regard to the point in controversy raised in the various decisions. It seems to me it would be a fruitless endeavour. I shall, therefore, confine myself to the decision of the present question on principles with regard to which there is no controversy; and that principle is that where the parties are related in the same degree, the preferential right should be in him who confers the greatest spiritual benefit on the deceased. This is one of the principles laid down in the case of Muthusami v. Muttukumarasami (11) which was affirmed by the Privy Council on appeal in the case of Muthusami Mudaliyar v. Muthukumarasami Mudaliyar (12), and I should follow the principle laid down in that case all the more, as their Lordships of the Privy Council observe in Vedachela v. Subramania (9) that in the absence of any express authority varying the rule, the propositions enunciated in Muthusami v. Muthukumarasami (12) furnish a safe guide. Those propositions are enunciated in the following terms: (i). Those who are bhinnagotra sapindas or are related through females born in or belonging to the family of the propositus are bandhus; (ii) that as stated in the text of Vridha Satatapa or Baudhayana, they are of three classes, viz., atma bandhus, pitri-bandhus and matri-bandhus, and matri-bandhus succeed in the order in which they are named; (iii) that the examples given therein are intended to show the mode in which nearness of affinity is to be ascertained; and (iv) that as between bandhus of the same class the spiritual benefit they confer upon the pro-positus is, as stated in the Viramitrodaya, a ground of preference.

This proposition that the ground of preference should be according to the spiritual benefit conferred upon the propositus is not controverted by the appellant's counsel. But he contends that in the present case the plaintiff confers greater benefit on the propositus than the defendants do. His argument is that the plaintiff offers three oblations to the maternal ancestors that is to say, his maternal grandfather; maternal great-grandfather and maternal great-great-grandfather. The propositus also offered oblations to all these three ancestors. On the other hand, the defendants offer the same class of divided oblations to their maternal grandfather, maternal great-grandfather and maternal great-great-grandfather. These relations are paternal grandfather, paternal great-grandfather and paternal great-great-grandfather of the propositus. The propositus offered oblations to three ascendants:—father, grandfather and great-grandfather. Therefore, the defendants offer oblations to two only of the ancestors of the propositus to whom he would have offered oblations. Therefore, there is greater merit conferred by the plaintiff than by the defendants. Against that Mr. Sarbadhikari for the respondents argues that the oblations offered to the paternal ancestors are of greater merit than those offered to the maternal ancestors, and the reason is that the propositus himself partakes of the oblations which are offered to his paternal ancestors. This proposition is supported by the authority of the Viromitrodaya which was referred to in the judgment in the case Muthusami v. Muttukumarasami (11) which I have already cited. At p. 155 of Golap Chandra Sarkar's Translation of the Viramitrodaya the following passage occurs:

Since a person (when deceased) partakes of the oblations presented to the three paternal ancestors beginning with the father by reason of the union of oblations (effected through the ceremony called sapinda karan); and since the three descendants in the male line beginning with the son presented oblations to that person himself; and since he who while living offered oblations to an ancestor in the male line partakes, when dead, of the oblations presented to that ancestor by reason of union of oblation: thus the middlemost person who, while living offered oblations to his ancestors and when dead partakes of the oblations presented to them becomes the object to whom oblations are presented by others that are living and partakes, with these latter while they are dead, of the oblations presented (to him) by the daughter's son and the like.

and so on. The conclusion must, therefore, follow that in the present case the defendants being so related as to confer greater spiritual benefit on the propositus they are the nearer heirs.

It is contended again on behalf of the appellant that the plaintiff is nearer in blood, because he has more blood particles in common with the propositus than the defendants; and learned counsel refers to the fact that the defendants are only sons of the father's half-sister of the propositus. It may possibly be that, according to medical theories the plaintiff may have more blood particles in common with the propositus than the defendants have. But the Mitakshara and the Viramitrodaya state that in doubtful cases the rule as to how it should be determined that a person has more blood particles in common with the propositus is that it should be decided in accordance with the efficacy of oblations offered to the ancestors.

The last argument that has been urged on behalf of the appellant is that if it had been a question between the father's full sister's son and the mother's sister's son, then the father's sister's son might possibly be entitled to preference. But a half-sister is not the same as a full sister: and therefore the father's half-sister's son cannot claim the same right as a full sister's son. It is further argued that what the old text meant by the term "father's sister's son" was father's full sister's son. But there is no difference between a half-sister and a full sister in this respect. If there had been a competition between a father's full sister's son and a father's half-sister's son, that would have been a matter for consideration. But when we have to consider the position of the parties as related in the present case, we have to deal with the matter on the basis of spiritual benefit. As the father's half-sister's son offers the same number of oblations to the paternal ancestors of the propositus and of the same efficacy as the father's full sister's son would have done I do not think that the fact of the defendants being the father's half-sister's son of the propositus makes any difference in this case. With regard to another argument that pitri-swasa in the enumeration of atma bandhus refers only to a full sister of the father, and half-sister's son of the father is not one of the enumerated atma bandhus, but would come merely as a bandhu not enumerated in the text it may be stated that the proper construction of the text does not lead to any such inference. Where the text writers meant that there should be a difference between the relations of full blood and half blood, that was specially enumerated. Where there is no such distinction made in the text, the words should be construed as including both full blood and half blood. As authority for this proposition the following cases may be referred to: Dasharathi Kundu v. Bipin Behari Kundu (13) and Shashi Bhushan Lahiri v. Rajendra Nath (14).

On all these grounds this appeal must fail and be dismissed with costs to the principal defendants-respondents.

A cross-objection has been urged on behalf of the defendants-respondents on the question as to the cost of the lower Court. The Subordinate Judge, although he has dismissed the suit of the plaintiff, has not allowed any costs. But he has not given any reason for doing so. We do not see any reason for depriving the contesting defendants of their costs in the Court below. The cross-objection must, therefore, be allowed to this extent that the contesting defendants would have their costs from the plaintiff in the Court below. There will be no costs of this cross-objection.

The law with regard to granting of injunction which obtains in a case brought against a trespasser is not the same as that in a case where one of the cosharers sues another in partition. Every owner of the land, whatever the extent of his share, has the right to use the land in any way which he thinks proper. If that be not so, it will not be possible for any cosharer to use any part of the land in coparcenary for any profitable purpose and, therefore, an order passed against a cosharer restraining him from building upon a portion of the joint property must be passed with great caution.

Order.—This rule is directed against an order granting a temporary injunction against the petitioner passed by the Subordinate Judge of Hooghly. The plaintiffs brought a suit for recovery of a share of the properties in suit. Defendant 2 is the petitioner before us and is a trading company in Calcutta who are building a mill on the land in suit and the injunction asked for by the plaintiffs and which has been granted by the Court is to the effect that the petitioners should be restrained from continuing to build on the land. The injunction was prayed for presumably under O. 39, R. (1), Cl. (a), which provides that the Court may by order grant a temporary injunction if the property in dispute in a suit is in danger of being wasted or damaged or alienated by any party to the suit. It is, therefore, necessary to see whether the present case is really a case in which any property is being wasted or damaged. We have been relieved of the necessity of dealing with this matter with regard to the merits by the admission made by the opposite party through their learned advocate that the defendants are not in possession of the land in suit or at any rate of the land on which they are attempting to erect this building. If that is so, this injunction is infructuous, for it is impossible for anyone to raise structures upon land in possession of another. But the learned advocate for the opposite party contends that the defendant company may forcibly dispossess the plaintiffs and continue their building operations on the land in suit. If that contingency arises the plaintiffs have a remedy in the criminal Court. We, therefore, need not consider this case on the footing of there being a possibility of the petitioners building upon the land in suit. The learned Subordinate Judge has only considered the question whether there is a bona fide dispute or not and having come to the conclusion that there is a bona fide dispute he has without further considering the matter granted the injunction prayed for: and in support of his order he has observed that great complications will arise if defendant 2 be allowed to build structures on the disputed property and if the suit be eventually decreed. We have heard the learned advocate for the opposite party at great length, but we are not convinced that really great complications will arise even if the plaintiffs succeed in their suit. The learned advocate for the petitioners has frankly admitted that his clients are prepared to take the risk of building upon the land in suit and to abide by the result of the suit, if it is decreed against them; and his clients will not raise any objection on the ground that they have raised buildings upon the land. In the present case we are not satisfied that the structures if raised by the petitioners upon the land in suit will cause any damage or waste to the opposite party as they are not using the land for any other purpose.

The question becomes very different when we take into consideration the fact that the present suit is one for partition and that defendant 2 admittedly is a sharer in the land in suit. The law with regard to granting of injunction which obtains in a case brought against a trespasser is not the same as that in a case where one of the cosharers sues another in partition. Every owner of the land, whatever the extent of his share, has the right to use the land in any way which he thinks proper and this has been laid down by their Lordships of the Judicial Committee. If that be not so, it will not be possible for any cosharer to use any part of the land in coparcenary for any profitable purpose and, therefore, an order passed against a cosharer restraining him from building upon a portion of the joint property must be passed with great caution. There may be circumstances under which a co-sharer may be restrained from doing any such act : for instance where the object of the co-sharer building upon a portion of the land is to induce the Court, when time for partition of the joint property comes, to let him have this land in preference to any other portion of it. We do not see how in this case the property in suit is liable to be damaged or wasted by defendant 2 erecting some structures upon it.

The next point which has been urged by the opposite party is that we should look into the balance of convenience. It is no doubt a safe guide ; and looking at it from this point of view we are of opinion that by this order of injunction greater inconvenience will be caused to the petitioner than to the opposite party. The petitioner intends to start a Mill on the adjacent land and this land is required for necessary structures ; and it is possible that if he is not allowed to build on this land his loss cannot be compensated by the opposite party.

The Rule is made absolute, and the order of the Court below granting injunction is set aside. The petitioners are entitled to their costs of this hearing. We assess the hearing fee at three gold mohurs.

Let the record be sent down as soon as possible.

Appeal No. 135 of 1926, Decided on 27th April 1927, from decree in original civil suit.

Companies Act, S. 202—Order of Court under S. 195, Companies Act, is not a judgment within the meaning of Cl. 15, Letters Patent (Calcutta), and hence not appealable under S. 202—Companies Act, S. 195—Letters Patent (Calcutta).

An order under S. 195, Companies Act, made by a Court directing the directors of a company to appear before the Court for examination as to their dealings in respect of the affairs of a company is not a judgment within the meaning of Cl. 15, Letters Patent (Calcutta) and therefore is not appealable. [P 296 C 1]

N. N. Sircar and S. C. Bose—for Appellant.

A. K. Roy—for Official Liquidator.

C. C. Ghose, J.—In this matter my learned brother, Mr. Justice Pearson, made an order on 17th November 1926 by which he directed that two persons, namely, Madan Gopal Daga and H. F. Pilcher, the directors of the abovenamed company* should appear before this Court for examination as to their dealings in respect of the affairs of the above company. This order which was made under the provisions of S. 195, Companies Act (7 of 1913) is the subject-matter of the present appeal. It is unnecessary for me to set out the facts involved in the present appeal because the same are to be found in my judgment, dated 22nd June 1926, printed on pp 37 and 38 of the paper-book and in the judgment of Mr. Justice Pearson, dated 17th November 1926, printed on pp 23 and 24 of the paper-book. A preliminary question has been raised as to whether the order made by Mr. Justice Pearson on 17th November 1926 is an appealable order.

Now the section of the Indian Companies Act relating to appeals from orders is S. 202 and it runs as follows:

Re-hearings of and appeals from any order or decision made or given in the matter of the winding up of a company by the Court may be had in the same manner and subject to the same conditions in and subject to which appeals may be had from any order or decision of the same Court in cases within its ordinary jurisdiction.

From the terms of this section it would appear that an order made in the matter of the winding up of a company to be appealable must come within the meaning of the word "judgment" as used in Cl. 15, Letters Patent, and, therefore, the question resolves itself into this, namely, whether the order made by Mr. Justice Pearson is a "judgment." I am not unmindful of the contention which has been advanced on behalf of the appellant, namely, that the words "same manner" and "same conditions" used in S. 202, Companies Act, mean that the procedure as regards appeals from orders made in the winding up of a company by the Court must be the same as in the case of orders made in cases within the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court and that nothing further was intended or is indicated. That may or may not be so; but in my view an order made in winding up in order to be appealable under S. 202, Companies Act, must satisfy the requirements of Cl. 15, Letters Patent as understood and explained in various decided cases in this Court from time to time. If that is so, then can it be said that the order made by Mr. Justice Pearson amounts to a "judgment"? It is urged that it amounts to a "judgment" inasmuch as it amounts to adjudication on the question as to whether the persons mentioned in the order were liable to be examined under the provisions of S. 195, Companies Act, and, that therefore, there has been a determination of a "right" or a "liability." I do not think that is the correct way of looking at the matter. All that was held by Mr. Justice Pearson amounted to this, namely, that a prima facie case has been made out by the liquidator for eliciting information about the affairs of the company from these two persons. Their "liability" has not been determined upon. After the best consideration that I have been able to give to this matter, I am unable to persuade myself that there has been any determination of any "right" or "liability" in this matter by Mr. Justice Pearson. In my opinion, therefore, the order made by Mr. Justice Pearson does not amount to a "judgment" as referred to in Cl. 15, Letters Patent. In the view I have taken it is unnecessary for me to go into the merits of the case.

The appeal, therefore, is incompetent and as such should be dismissed with costs.

Buckland, J.—The section does not give an unqualified right of appeal. It gives such a right, but in the same manner and subject to the same conditions in and subject to which appeals may be had from any order or decision of the same Court in cases within its ordinary jurisdiction.

Conditions have to be fulfilled and one of the conditions to be fulfilled in the case of an appeal from an order or decision of a Judge exercising original civil jurisdiction is that the order or decision must be a judgment. That is by virtue of Cl. 15, Letters Patent, besides which, in addition to this section, nothing is relied upon as giving a right of appeal. Unless, therefore, the order of Pearson, J. is a judgment it does not fulfil the condition and there is nothing more to be said.

The word "manner" in my opinion is intended, primarily at least, to refer to procedure. Whether it connotes anything more is a question which may have to be more fully considered in other circumstances hereafter. Whatever its full and precise significance may be, it cannot assist the appellant on this point.

As to the order appealed against being a judgment I agree with the view which my learned brother has expressed and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

v.

Mt. Daksha Bala Dassi Chowdhurani and others—Opposite Parties.

Civil Revn. No. 1095 of 1927, Decided on 5th January 1928, from decree of 1st Munsif, Krishnagar, D/- 30th May 1927.

Bengal Patni Regulation (8 of 1819), S. 14—Sale of patni in a rent decree—Surplus withdrawn by a creditor of one patnidar—Sale subsequently set aside—Zamindar made to pay whole purchase-money—Suit lies by zamindar against the creditor—Suit is governed by Art. 120, and not Art. 62, Limitation Act.

Certain patni was sold for arrears of rent under patni regulation on 17th December 1919 and was purchased by a third party. The zamindars took out their dues from the purchase-money and the balance remained in deposit. A decree-holder against one of the patnidars attached the surplus sale proceeds on 4th June 1920 and realized his dues in full under that attachment on 25th September 1920. Some of the darpatnidars, however, on 17th September 1920, brought a suit to have the patni sale set aside. The suit was decreed and the zamindars had to refund to the auction-purchaser the amount which the auction-purchaser had paid for the patni at the putni auction. Thereafter, a suit was brought by the zamindars against the decree-holder to recover with interest Rs. 161 which he had withdrawn by attachment under the money decree.

Held: that the decree-holder took the risk of withdrawing the money when the period of limitation for bringing a suit to set aside the sale had not yet expired. He acted at his own risk and was therefore liable to refund the amount: 38 C. L. J. 197, Rel. on. [P 297 C 2]

Held: further, that the decree-holder, when he took the money or the Court when it handed over to him the money, did not intend the money to be for the use of the zamindars and therefore Art. 62 did not apply but the residuary Art. 120 would apply. [P 297 C 2]

Judgment.—This rule has been obtained in a Small Cause Court suit. It appears that the zamindars, now opposite parties 1 and 2, had under them opposite parties 3 to 9 as their patnidars. The patni was sold for arrears of rent under the patni regulation on 17th December 1919, and was purchased by a third party. The zamindars took out their dues from the purchase-money and the balance remained in deposit. Thereafter, the present petitioner who held a money decree against opposite party 3 attached the surplus sale proceeds on 4th June 1920, and realized his dues in full under that attachment on 25th September 1920. Some of the darpatnidars, however, on 17th November 1920, that is to say, eleven months after the patni sale brought a suit to have the patni sale set aside. The suit was decreed by the Subordinate Judge of Nadia in January 1922 and that decree was confirmed by this Court. Under that decree, the zamindars, opposite parties 1 and 2 had to refund to the auction-purchaser the amount which the auction-purchaser had paid for the patni at the patni auction. Thereafter, the present Small Cause Court suit was brought by opposite parties 1 and 2, the zamindars, against the patnidars and the present petitioner to recover with interest Rs. 161 which the present petitioner had withdrawn by attachment under his money decree against opposite party 3. The Small Cause Court Judge has given the zamindars, opposite parties 1 and 2, a decree against the present petitioner only for Rs. 161 with interest and discharged the case as against the other opposite parties, the patnidars. A rule has been obtained as to why this decree should not be set aside or varied.

Two points are taken by the present petitioner, the judgment-creditor of opposite party 3, one of the patnidars. The first is that his money decree is now barred and has been already satisfied. If he has now got to refund the money, he will never recover his decree for Rs. 161 from defendant 2 and he states that the plaintiffs may get a decree against opposite party 3 but that they should not get a decree against him. The second point raised is that the Small Cause Court suit was barred by limitation. I have heard the learned vakil for the petitioner. As to the first point: the matter, as was pointed out by the learned Small Cause Court Judge, is very similar to the case of Behari Lal Seal v. Bijoy Chand (1), though in that case the surplus sale-proceeds were withdrawn by the patnidars during the pendency of a suit to set aside the patni sale. Here, the petitioner took the risk of withdrawing the money when the period of limitation for bringing a suit to set aside the sale had not yet expired. He, therefore, acted at his own risk and I am not prepared, therefore, to say that the decision of the Small Cause Court Judge is in this respect contrary to law. As to the second point, the learned Small Cause Court Judge held that Art. 120, Lim. Act, would apply. It is urged on behalf of the petitioner that Art. 62 would apply and so the suit is barred by limitation. In this connexion, I am referred to the case of Harihar Misser v. Syed Mohamed (2), and it is urged that that case is an authority to show that Art. 62 applies. To my mind, it is an authority to show that Art. 62 does not apply, for the learned Judges there pointed out that the point to be decided when the question is whether Art. 62 applies or not is for whose use did the party making the payment intend the money. Now, it cannot be said that the petitioner when he took the money or the Court when it handed over to him the money intended the money to be for the use of opposite parties 1 and 2. In this view, I cannot hold that Art. 62 applies; the other articles mentioned in the lower Court have not been invoked before me. I must hold, therefore, that the learned Small Cause Court Judge has rightly fallen back on the residuary Art. 120. The opposite parties 4 to 9 appear, but opposite party 3 does not. They maintain that they are entitled to their costs as they have been unnecessarily impleaded in this Court. They never had anything to do with the taking out of the money which was taken out as if it was the sole property of opposite party 3 who does not appear.

In the result, the rule is discharged with costs. I allow two sets of costs, one to opposite parties 1 and 2 and the other set to opposite parties 4 to 9, two gold mohurs in each case.

Appeal No. 978 of 1925, Decided on 12th December 1927, from appellate decree of Addl. Dist., Judge, Midnapore, D/- 16th February 1925.

Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 103A and S. 103B — Record-of-rights finally published — Presumption under S. 103B arises — But order under S. 103A directing the name of a particular person to be entered is a valuable evidence as to possession by such person.

The presumption under S. 103, Cl. (b), no doubt attaches to the record-of-rights when it is finally published, but an order passed by a revenue officer on a dispute in proceeding under S. 103A directing the name of a particular person to be entered in respect of a certain property is a very valuable piece of evidence on the question of possession so far as that party is concerned. [P 299 C 2]

*Brojo Lal Chakravarti and Santimoy Majumdar—*for Appellants.

*Apurba Charan Mukerjee—*for Respondents.

Mukerji, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit which was instituted by the plaintiffs for declaration of title to and for confirmation of possession in or, in the alternative, for recovery of possession in respect of, an eight annas share in a tank and its bank. The suit was dismissed by the trial Court, that Court holding that the plaintiffs had failed to make out their title and that they had not been in possession, at any time, of the property in suit before the suit was instituted. The lower appellate Court, on an appeal being preferred by the plaintiffs from the aforesaid decision, reversed the said decision and decreed the suit in plaintiffs' favour holding that the plaintiffs had succeeded in proving their title and also that the suit was not barred by limitation. The plaintiffs' case, shortly stated, was that the tank in question belonged originally to two brothers Nilmani Ray and Madhusudhan Ray in equal shares. The plaintiffs claimed to have acquired the eight annas share of Madhusudhan Ray and Nilmani Ray's share, according to the plaintiffs, devolved upon the contesting defendants. The arguments that have been advanced in support of this appeal which has been preferred by the defendants may be classed under two heads. The main arguments have been directed towards the finding of the learned Additional District Judge on the question of the plaintiff's title. It would be tedious to set out in detail all that has been urged so far as this branch of the appellants' contention is concerned. It has been urged, for instance, that the attention of the lower appellate Court was directed more to the question of the superior right in the tank and that the findings that have been arrived at by that Court in plaintiffs' favour really related to the said superior right, while, in point of fact, the subject matter of the suit was the jote right in the said property. It has been also urged that certain important documents or rather the bearing of them, so far as the present case is concerned, have not been properly considered by the learned Additional District Judge and in this respect reference has been made to such documents as Exs. N 1, and D 1. It has been also contended that there is an inconsistency in the findings of the learned District Judge so far as Exs. 7 A and D 2 are concerned; because while the learned Judge has said that D 2 does not relate to the property in suit, he has relied upon Ex. 7 A which gives the same pottah number of the property as D 2 contains.

These and various other matters have been brought to our notice but having given to all these matters the consideration that they deserve, we are of opinion that the learned Additional District Judge has very elaborately discussed the bearing of all the relevant documents and arrived at a conclusion with which it is not possible for us to interfere in second appeal. As regards the jote right, it is clear that there are some documents which deal with the said right and the findings of the learned Additional District Judge, so far as this right is concerned, cannot be said to have been based on no evidence. As regards D 1 and N 1 they have been specifically referred to in the learned Additional District Judge's judgment and as regards 7 A and D 2, the argument process is merely upon the fact that the same pottah number is given in the two documents: while, on a careful consideration of these documents, it will be clear that there are other matters mentioned which go to show that the properties to which they relate are not identical. This contention, directed against the question of the plaintiffs' title, must, therefore, be overruled. The finding that the plaintiffs' title to the eight annas share of the tank and its banks will accordingly stand.

The other arguments that have been advanced relate to the question of limitation and generally to the finding of the learned District Judge as regards the question of the plaintiffs' possession. The learned Additional District Judge has observed in his judgment that the record-of-rights was finally published on the 27th October 1910, and, inasmuch as the suit was instituted on 27th October 1922, it was not time barred. He has made the following further observation in his judgment :

I believe plaintiffs' evidence of possession up to the final publication of the record-of-rights. It is true that the defendants are in possession since the final publication of the record-of-rights as told by some of the plaintiffs' witnesses.

He seems, therefore, to have been of opinion that inasmuch as the suit was instituted within 12 years from the date on which the record-of-rights was finally published and as upon the evidence he was able to come to the conclusion that the plaintiff was in possession up to that date and the defendants came to be in possession only after the record-of-rights was finally published ; therefore, the suit was within time. The whole of the reasoning taken together if it can at all be accepted may perhaps be considered sufficient to dispose of the question of limitation and also the question of the plaintiffs' possession. But there is an initial difficulty in accepting this reasoning which has been given by the learned Judge. It appears that although the record-of-rights was finally published on the 27th October 1910, on 8th January 1909, an order was passed by the revenue authorities on a dispute in proceedings taken under S. 103(A), B. T. Act, that the name of the second party alone, that is to say, of the defendants in the present suit was to be recorded in the whole of the Nisf No. 4870 to which the subject-matter of the suit relates. The presumption under S. 103, Cl. (B) B. T. Act, no doubt attaches to the record-of-rights when it is finally published ; but it cannot be disputed that the order passed by a revenue officer directing the name of a particular person to be entered in respect of a certain property is a very valuable piece of evidence on the question of possession so far as that party is concerned. This entry which is Ex 24 in the case does not appear to have been considered by the learned District Judge ; because wherever he has referred to the entries in the settlement records, he has referred only to the records finally published. I am of opinion that in arriving at his finding on the question of possession, the learned Additional District Judge, in having ignored this very important piece of evidence which is on the side of the defendants and in relying entirely upon the oral evidence of possession that is on the record and which must necessarily be of a far less evidentiary value, has not dealt properly with the case.

I am, accordingly, of opinion that while the findings of the learned Additional District Judge on the question of the plaintiffs' title must be taken to be final and will not be allowed to be reopened here, his decision on the question of plaintiffs' possession and on the question of limitation will have to be set aside and the case sent back so that the latter question only may now be dealt with afresh on hearing the parties again with reference to the materials on the record.

The appeal is thus allowed and the case remanded to the lower appellate Court to be dealt with in the light of observations made above.

Costs of this appeal will abide the result of the remand.

Kanai Lal Saha and Biraj Mohan Majumdar—for Respondents.

Suhrawardy, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit by the plaintiff for recovery of possession of certain piece of land said to have been purchased by him from defendants 3, 4 and 5. The plaintiff's case was that the land belonged to three brothers Raj Mohan, Nanda Mohan and Deba Mandal. After the death of Raj Mohan and Deba Mandal their shares were inherited by defendants 3 and 4—defendant 5 being one of the brothers. The defence of the principal defendants was that the property belonged to Rajmohan alone and that he had transferred it to the defendants before his death. During the progress of the suit in the trial Court the plaintiff added an alternative prayer to his plaint, namely, that if it was found that his vendors had no interest in the property the price paid by him to them might be decreed against them. The defence of the vendor-defendants was that the land belonged to the three brothers and that Rajmohan did not sell the land to defendants 1 and 2 as alleged by them, but that they had sold the land to the plaintiff; and consequently a decree for refund of purchase money should not be made against them. Judhithir, defendant 3, further said that the entire purchase money, as mentioned in the kobala, was not paid to him and a portion of it was still unpaid. The Munsif in the trial Court held upon an examination of the evidence that the case for defendants 1 and 2 was true and that the property belonged to Rajmohan alone who had sold it to the defendants as alleged by them. On appeal the learned Subordinate Judge found that the property did not belong to Rajmohan alone, that it belonged to all the three brothers jointly and that the kobala propounded by the defendants was not executed by Rajmohan and was not a genuine document. After entering this finding against the defendants the learned Subordinate Judge went on to discuss the merits of the plaintiff's case and remarked that the consideration of the three kabalas from defendants 3, 4 and 5, though they had equal shares, was not the same. He, however, does not question the genuineness of the plaintiff's kabalas but records an opinion about them in these words:

In my opinion, all these kabalas were mere paper transactions and they were created to enable the plaintiff to bring this suit. If the plaintiff really intended to purchase this land, he would have paid Rs. 200 to Judhithir. I, therefore, find no reason to decide the question of title in plaintiff's favour.

In the result he confirmed the decree of the Munsif which was to the effect that the plaintiff's suit should be dismissed and that amount admitted by defendants 3, 4 and 5 to have been received from the plaintiff should be returned to the plaintiff by the defendants. I regret I am unable to follow the reasoning of the learned Subordinate Judge in this matter. He finds that the defendants' kabalas were not genuine. The defendants are, therefore, trespassers and he holds that the plaintiff's kabalas are genuine, but says that they are paper transactions created in order to enable the plaintiff to bring this suit. It is difficult to understand what the learned Subordinate Judge exactly means by using the words "paper transaction." This is one of the instances where expressions are loosely used without attaching proper legal significance to them. The reason that the Subordinate Judge gives for holding that the plaintiff's kabalas are paper transactions is that they were created to enable the plaintiff to recover possession of land from the defendants. If that is the idea with which the documents were created I do not see why they should be called paper transactions. The vendors admit that they sold the property and the purchaser claims that he has purchased this property. That being so, it is difficult to imagine any circumstances which would enable the Court to say that the documents were paper transactions.

In the case of Lal Achal Ram v. Raja Kazim Husain (1), their Lordships of the Judicial Committee held that where the plaintiff suing in ejectment claimed under a transfer from the true owner, the deed of sale containing an untrue statement as to the payment of the purchase money, but being otherwise reasonable in its terms, and affirmed and acted upon by both vendor and purchaser, and neither champertous nor contrary to public policy, it operated as a present transfer to the plaintiff, giving him a good title on which it was competent for him to sue, unless the defendants succeed in proving that the transfer was not merely voidable but absolutely void. The present case seems to me to fall exactly within the principle enunciated by their Lordships. It is a suit against a trespasser who has no right to retain possession of the property as against the true owners of it. The true owners are defendants 3, 4 and 5. They say that they had sold the property to the plaintiff and the plaintiff in virtue of that transfer—it does not matter whether the entire consideration money was paid for the transfer—brought the present suit against the defendants who had no right to retain possession of it in the presence of his vendor. In support of the view of the Court below reference has been made to the decision in the case of Kamini Kumar Deb v. Durga Charan Nag (2), where it has been held that if a document is fictitious the principle in the decision in Achal Ram's case (1) does not apply. Though I consider that the law as broadly enunciated in that judgment is an inroad upon the principle underlying the decision of the Judicial Committee in Achal Ram's case (1), I do not think that the considerations which influenced their Lordships in Kamini Kumar's case (2), to hold against the document are present in the present case. In Kamini Kumar's case (2), there is no finding that the defendants were trespassers. In fact on the statement of the facts of that case it is evident that they had some ostensible right to the possession of the lands in suit there. It has not been further found that the person who had title to the land support the plaintiff's title either in the plaintiff in his own right or in the plaintiff as the representative of the true owner. The contention of the defendants in that case was that the conveyance upon which the plaintiff relied was without any consideration and passed no right. It may be said that a transaction without any consideration is void and, therefore, falls outside the decision in Achal Ram's case (1). In the present case there was consideration, though inadequate according to the Subordinate Judge, upon which plaintiff's title was well founded. If the consideration is inadequate the vendors may have the right to void the transaction, or in other words it renders the transaction voidable. If the whole of the purchase money is not paid to one of the vendors he has the right of an unpaid vendor under the law. But any question that may arise between a vendor and a vendee with reference to the transaction is outside the competence of a trespasser to challenge the validity of the sale on any such ground.

Now, the reason which the Subordinate Judge has given to hold that the kobalas are paper transactions is that they are created to enable the plaintiff to bring the suit. Admitting the object to be as stated by the Subordinate Judge I do not find any reason why the plaintiff cannot maintain the suit. The vendors, defendants 3, 4 and 5 had the right to maintain the suit. The plaintiff under those transactions is either their agent or benamdar in either capacity he is entitled to maintain the suit. Then again under the decree passed by the Subordinate Judge the amount of consideration received by defendants 3, 4 and 5 has been decreed against them. The vendors admit that they have sold the property and received the price therefor, and the purchaser says that he has purchased it and paid the consideration for it. I fail to see on what principle of law the vendors can be compelled in these circumstances to return the purchase money. In my opinion on the finding arrived at by the Subordinate Judge the plaintiff is entitled to succeed.

 Limitation Act, Art. 182, Cl. (5)—Step-in-aid—Order for issue of warrant—Inference that Court acted on some application of a decree-holder can be drawn—Such application as a step-in-aid.*

The filing of an affidavit of service which is the same thing as proving service of notice on the judgment-debtors is a step-in-aid of execution. The fact that an order for issue of warrant was made shows conclusively that the Court must have acted on some application or other of the decree-holders and such an application is a step-in-aid of execution within the meaning of Art. 182, Cl. Gopenbra Nath Das—for Appellants.

Surajit Chunder Lahiri—for Respondents.

C. C. Ghose, J.—In this case, the only question involved is a question of limitation. The appellants are the decree-holders and they applied for execution of the decree which they had obtained, the application for execution being filed on 31st October 1924. It appears that the Durga Puja holidays of that year did not terminate till that date and, therefore, if it be held that the decree-holders were within time, that is to say, that the application was filed within a period of three years from 28th September 1921, the date when the decree-holders filed process fee in the previous execution case, then it must follow as a necessary corollary that their present application for execution was within time. The dispute between the parties is with reference to what has happened on 28th September 1921. The appellants contend that what happened on 28th

September should be regarded by the Court as a step-in-aid of execution within the meaning of Art. 182, Cl. (5), Sch. 1, Lim. Act. Whereas the respondents contend that the decree-holders did not take any step whatsoever in aid of execution within a period of three years from the date when they last made their application for execution and that, therefore, the lower appellate Court, was right in holding that the application was barred by limitation. Now, the order-sheet shows what happened on 28th September 1921. The order runs as follows :

Service of notice proved. Decree-holders to file the remaining process-fees within a short time. Issue warrant of arrest returnable by 30th November 1921.

As far as one can make out from the order-sheet and from the order under date 28th September 1921 two things happened on that date. First, the decree-holders proved that service of notice upon the judgment-debtors had been effected and, in the second place, it is reasonably clear that the decree-holders must have made an application orally to the Court for an order for warrant of arrest of the judgment-debtors. It has been held in the case of Pran Krishna Das v. Pratap Chandra Daloi (1), that the filing of an affidavit of service which is the same thing as proving service of notice on the judgment-debtors is a step-in-aid of execution. Speaking for myself, I see no reason to take a view different to that taken by Woodroffe and Walmsley, JJ., in the case referred to above. In the present case, the decree-holders, in my opinion, are on stronger ground when they point to the order-sheet and ask us to infer that they must have made an oral application to the Court for issue of warrant of arrest and that their application was granted. The fact that an order for issue of warrant was made shows conclusively that the Court must have acted on some application or other of the decree-holders. If the decree-holders had made an application which resulted in the order for issue of warrant of arrest of the judgment-debtors, it must be held that the decree-holders did take on that date a step-in-aid of execution within the meaning of Art. 182, Cl. (5), Sch. 1, Lim. Act. That being so, no question of limitation can possibly arise in this case and it must be held, in my opinion, that the decree-holders' application was within time. In my judgment, the appeal should be allowed and the judgment-debtors' objection to execution must be dismissed with costs. The hearing-fee in this Court is assessed at two gold mohurs.

Buckland, J.—I see no possible ground upon which this case can be distinguished from the case of Pran Krishna Das v. Patap Chandra Daloi (1). I, therefore, agree that the appeal should be allowed with costs.

Jitendra Kumar Sen Gupta—for Appellant.

Cuming, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit by a Mahomedan lady for a declaration that the marriage tie between herself and her husband has been dissolved. Her case was that she was married to one Fazlul Karim Mea on the 17th August 1905, that a kabilnama was executed by the defendant in her favour in which he agreed not to remarry during the lifetime of the plaintiff and not to illtreat her. He further contracted not to cause her pain of body or mind, not to desert her, to maintain her wherever she lived of her own choice, not to misconduct himself and always to behave properly; there was a further agreement that if he violated any of these terms embodied in the kabilnama the plaintiff would have the power to divorce herself from her husband. It was the case of the plaintiff that the defendant had violated all these terms and that in the exercise of that power she divorced herself from her husband on the 10th April 1921 by uttering the word 'Talak' three times. She further executed a deed of divorce which was registered. The defendant contended that the kabilnama was not binding upon him, that it was executed after the marriage and that he was minor at the time. He further alleged that it had been executed under his wife's undue influence and coercion. He further denied the allegations as to ill-treatment, cruelty, misconduct and desertion. He apparently did not deny that he had violated one of the conditions, namely, that he had remarried twice. The first Court found in favour of the plaintiff and granted her the declaration sought for. In appeal the learned Judge set aside the decree of the first Court and dismissed the plaintiff's suit. He found that the kabilnama was executed not immediately after the marriage, but about a month after the marriage. He found that at the time of the marriage the defendant was under the age of 18. He further found that the contract had been entered into as the result of undue influence exerted by the wife's relation through the wife. He found that one of the terms of the contract had been violated, namely, the plaintiff's husband had remarried. He further held that this talak by agreement can only be entered into before the marriage. He further found that the contract itself was entered into by the defendant when he was a minor and, therefore, he could repudiate it on obtaining majority specially when the contract was vitiated by undue influence and coercion. He, therefore, allowed the appeal.

The plaintiff has appealed to this Court. This appeal raises a number of difficult questions of Mahomedan law and we are in the somewhat unfortunate position that the respondent in the case is not represented before the Court. The first point urged by the learned vakil for the appellant is that the learned Judge was wrong in holding that a talak by agreement must be entered into before the marriage; in support of this contention he cited the case of Sainuddin v. Latifannessa Bibi (1). In that case Shamsul Huda, J., had to decide this particular point, namely as to whether a post-nuptial delegation of the power of divorce or tutweer-i-talaq, as it is called by Musalman lawyers, is not valid. The learned Judge remarks:

No authority has been cited for such a proposition. A reference to books on Mahomedan law makes it abundantly clear that such post-nuptial delegation is valid.

This disposes of the first objection of the learned Judge. The next point that has been raised before us is whether a Mahomedan minor can enter into a contract by which he delegates the power of divorce to his wife in the event of certain circumstances happening. Admittedly the general rule is that a minor cannot contract. The learned vakil for the plaintiff-appellant relies upon S. 2 of Majority Act. S. 2 provides that:

Nothing herein contained shall affect the capacity of any person to act in the following matters, namely, marriage, dower, divorce and adoption.

The learned vakil for the appellant contends that the delegation of power to divorce to wife is an act in the matter of divorce and therefore, falls within S. 2, Cl. 1, of the Majority Act. This view which the learned vakil would have us adopt of S. 2 of the Majority Act is supported by the decision of the Bombay High Court in the case of Bai Shirinbai v. Kharshedji (2) with special reference to p. 436. There the learned Judges remark:

The Majority Act does not use the expression "capacity to contract" but "capacity to act" which is of much wider import.

The expression includes also capacity to contract. Adopting this view of the meaning of the expression "capacity to act in the matter of divorce" we hold that a minor can delegate to his wife the power of divorce.

There only remains the finding of the learned Judge that the contract was vitiated by undue influence and coercion. In dealing with this point the learned Judge remarks as follows:

The contract under consideration is an ordinary contract and not one of marriage, dower or divorce. As regards the plea of undue influence and coercion, the very terms of the contract show that there must have been some such thing there to induce defendant to bind himself hand and foot in that way. As regards the statement that it was the wife's act, the meaning must have been that it was exercised by the wife through other persons of mature age.

Therefore, as far as can be seen, the learned Judge in coming to the conclusion that the defendant had established the plea of undue influence and coercion, has relied on the terms of the contract itself. Looking at the contract itself it cannot for one moment be held that the stipulation to allow the wife in certain circumstances to divorce herself from the husband would of itself show that the contract was brought about by undue influence and coercion. There was nothing whatever unreasonable in the husband to delegate to the wife the very same power to divorce in the event of certain circumstances happening. There is a further finding of the learned Judge that the undue influence was exercised not really by the wife, but by her relations. In other words the defendant has not made out the plea that the contract was brought about by the undue influence of the wife; and when we look at the age of the parties and the circumstances in which the contract was entered into this plea of undue influence and coercion is absurd.

The picture of a child of some 12 or 13 by undue influence and coercion inducing another child of sixteen or so to enter into a particular contract or to consent to some particular term in a contract borders on the ridiculous. It is to my mind difficult to see how such a plea could be seriously put forward. It is more difficult to see how it could actually be accepted.

The result is that we set aside the decree of the lower appellate Court and restore the decree of the trial Court. The appellant is entitled to her costs both here and in the lower appellate Court.

Judgment.—The decree of the lower appellate Court which has given rise to this appeal is divisible into two parts. The first of these parts is the decree for arrears of rent that has been awarded to the plaintiff. The second part of it relates to the question of enhanceability of the existing rent. The appeal to this Court is directed against the second part aforesaid and is confined to the relief which the plaintiffs claimed for enhancement of rent. The trial Court decreed the suit at the existing rate of rent with damages at 12½ per cent. The prayer for enhancement of rent was dismissed by that Court. The lower appellate Court has confirmed the decree for arrears of rent with the modification that instead of 12½ per cent as damages, damages have been awarded at 25 per cent. As regards the prayer for enhancement of rent the order that has been made by the lower appellate Court is that the decree of the trial Court is to be set aside and the case remanded for a fresh decision of the question in the light of such further evidence as the parties may think fit to adduce. The order in question appears to me to be one which is not one of those orders of remand from which an appeal would lie under the Civil Procedure Code. It is an order which the learned Judge evidently thought fit to pass in the exercise of its inherent jurisdiction and for the ends of justice. I am, therefore, of opinion that no appeal would lie from this decision and that the present appeal must, therefore, on that ground be dismissed.

I have been asked by the learned vakil for the appellants to treat the memorandum of appeal as an application under S. 115, Civil P. C. I have given the matter the consideration that it deserves but I am unable to say that the reason which the learned Additional District Judge has given for making an order would not justify the same. Speaking for myself, I would perhaps not entirely agree with the view which the learned Additional District Judge has taken at least as regards the form in which he has made the order. That, however, is a different matter. On the whole I am unable to hold that the order, such as it is, calls for the interference of this Court under the provisions of S. 115, Civil P. C.

The learned vakil for the appellants has brought to my notice the fact that settlement operations are in progress in the district to which the case relates and that in view of the provisions of S. 111, Ben. Ten. Act, the further trial of the suit that has been ordered by the learned Additional District Judge should be stayed. This, no doubt, is a matter that has got to be considered, but I would leave it to the trial Court to determine whether the section to which I have just now referred is applicable under the circumstances and to pass such orders as regards this matter as it may consider proper to pass.

The appeal is dismissed, but in the circumstances there will be no order as to costs.

Appeal No. 867 of 1925, Decided on 30th November 1927, from appellate decree of Addl. Sub-Judge, Chittagong, D/- 16th January 1925.

Landlord and Tenant—Deed of kabuliyat—Construction.

A tenancy consisted of a tank with its bank and a plot of land adjoining thereto. It was created by a kabuliyat by which the tenant got a right to graze cattle on the bank after fencing them all round, rear fish and catch them, and enjoy the fruits of fruit bearing trees then existing on the bank. The kabuliyat was headed as a "kabuliyat for nine years." Below the heading when naming the tenant as executant it spoke of him as Makbulali cultivator for nine years.

Held: that the object of kabuliyat was to create an agricultural tenancy in favour of the tenant. [P 305 C 2]

Narendra Kumar Das—for Appellant.

Chandra Sekhar Sen—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The contention that has been urged in this appeal is that the Subordinate Judge was wrong in holding that the tenancy in suit is governed by the Transfer of Property Act and that the Munsif who tried the suit had rightly held that the Bengal Tenancy Act applied to it.

The subject-matter of the tenancy is a tank with its banks and a plot of land adjoining thereto. It had its origin in a kabuliyat the material portion of which runs in these words:

I shall graze cattle on the banks after fencing them all round. I shall rear new fish and catch them and shall not make any objection to your catching the old fish. I shall enjoy the fruits of the fruit-bearing trees now existing on the banks. I shall be entitled to catch fish throughout the year and shall not be competent to raise objection to your catching fish on any festive occasion. If I fill up the tank without your permission I shall not be entitled to raise any objection to your getting khas possession of it. I shall always clear the weeds of the tank and if the tank is not cleared I shall be liable for damage.

Were these terms the only materials from which the purpose of the tenancy had to be determined, I would have agreed with the respondents' contention that it was not made out that the tenancy was for agricultural or horticultural purposes. The defendant's (appellant's) case in the written statement was that he had cultivated paddy, etc., on the lands and had grown fruit trees on the banks of the tank, and that he had not used the lands for the purpose of grazing. The Munsif held that he did not cultivate the lands, but used the same for the purposes of grazing. This finding has not been reversed by the Subordinate Judge. On this finding the defendant seeks to argue that the grazing was for a purpose ancillary or incidental to his cultivation of other lands in the village, in respect of which he is a settled ryot as is shown by the khatian. Whether having put forward a definite case which failed, the defendant can be, or at any rate should be, permitted to construct another case upon the findings that have been arrived at against him, may be debatable question. But, in my opinion, there is much surer indication than all this in the kabuliyat itself as regards the status of the defendant which it purported to create.

The kabuliyat is headed as a "kabuliyat for nine years." Below this heading, when naming the defendant as the executant, it speaks of him as "Naysena Meadi Chasa Sree Makbul Ali" (i. e., Makbulali cultivator for nine years). I am of opinion that it was so said because the object was to create in favour of the defendant an agricultural tenancy for nine years or to make him a cultivating tenant for that period. I think there is no ambiguity in the meaning of the document and that the view taken by the Munsif of the defendant's status is the correct one.

I accordingly allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the Subordinate Judge and restore that of the Munsif with costs in this as well as the lower appellate Court.

Civil Rule No 959 of 1927, Decided on 5th December 1927, against judgment of first Court Munsif, Sudharam, D/- 29th Apr. 1927 in S.C.C. Suit No. 1436 of 1926.

Limitation Act, Art. 36—Suit to recover price of goods lost by the carrier—Delivery so as to give carrier lawful possession must be proved.

To give rise to these special privileges or liabilities which attach to transactions by or with carriers, the relationship as between a carrier and his customer has first to be established and, for the presumption of an implied contract to carry, delivery of the goods so as to enable the carrier to acquire lawful possession of the goods for the purpose of carriage is the indispensable essential.

Plaintiff put the goods on the defendant's ferry boat for conveyance and himself got on to it. He found that the boat was being overloaded and feeling it unsafe to travel on it, he got down and wanted to take down his goods but the defendant refused to allow him to do so. The boat started on its journey with his goods and capsized on the way and the goods were lost. He sued to recover price of the goods.

Held: that as there was no delivery in this case the article applicable to the case was not Art. 30 or 31 but the general article namely Art. 36. [P 307 C 1]

Jitendra Kumar Sen Gupta—for Petitioner.

Akhil Chandra Dutt—for Opposite Parties.

Judgment.—The only question which arises in this rule is whether the plaintiff's claim is barred by limitation.

The learned Munsif has held that the suit is barred under Art. 30 or 31, Sch. 1, Lim. Act, having been instituted more than one year after the date when the loss or injury took place or when the goods ought to have been delivered.

Shortly stated the facts which have not been controverted are that the plaintiff put the goods on the defendant's ferry boat for conveyance and himself got on to it. Other passengers with their goods also did so. The plaintiff found that the boat was being overloaded and feeling it unsafe to travel on it, he got down and wanted to take down his goods but the defendants refused to allow him to do so. Notwithstanding the plaintiff's protest the boat started on its journey with his goods and capsized on the way and the goods were lost. The claim is for recovery of price of the goods.

To give rise to those special privileges or liabilities which attach to transactions by or with carriers, the relationship as between a carrier and his customer has to be first established. There was admittedly no express contract for carriage: and for the presumption of an implied contract to arise, delivery of the goods so as to enable the carrier to acquire lawful possession of the goods for the purpose of carriage is the indispensable essential. It is difficult to see upon the facts set forth above that there was any delivery in this case. The Article applicable to the case is, therefore, not Art. 30 or 31 but Art. 36, and the claim was not barred.

The other facts having been found in plaintiff's favour, the plaintiff is entitled to a decree.

The rule is made absolute. The decree of the learned Munsif is set aside and plaintiff's suit is decreed with costs in the trial Court as well as in this Court. Hearing fee in this rule is fixed at one gold mohur.

Appeal No. 239 of 1925, Decided on 29th June 1927, from original decree of Dist. Judge, Assam Valley Dt., D/- 24th October 1925.

(a) Succession Act (39 of 1925), S. 237—Application for probate of a draft of a will — Applicant not able to prove that the will has been lost or mislaid since the testator's death — Applicant is not entitled to the probate.

Where the applicant for grant of probate or letters of administration of the draft of a will alleged to have been executed by a testator, is not able to prove that the will has been lost or mislaid since the testator's death, he has failed to satisfy the terms of S. 237 and is, therefore, not entitled to the probate. [P 309 C 2]

(b) Will — Revocation—No rule can be laid down as to circumstances under which presumption of revocation of will can arise.

The question as to the presumption of the will being revoked by the testator with reference to the fact of its being in his possession till the time of his death is to be decided more or less upon the circumstances of each case. It cannot be laid down as a rule of law that under certain circumstances a presumption should be made that the will was revoked by the testator or not. Allan v. Morrison, (1900) A. B. B. Ghose, J.—This is an appeal against the judgment and decree of the District Judge of Assam Valley Districts refusing to grant probate or letters of administration of the draft of a will alleged to have been executed by the testator, Jipati Thakuria, in January 1904. The applicant was the daughter of the testator. The testator died on 25th June 1910. At the time of his death, he had his daughter, the petitioner, his widow Podai, the objectrix, an infant son, Kali Charan, and another stepson named Nanmal. At the date of the will his son, Kali Charan, was not born. By the will, a 3rd share each was given to Efari, the petitioner, Podai, the wife, and to Nanmal. It is alleged by the petitioner that after the death of the testator each of the three persons was in possession by taking pattas from the revenue authorities of the lands left by the testator and they were in joint possession till the year 1923. In 1924 disputes commenced among those parties and the petitioner was sought to be deprived of her share of the properties and that is the reason why she has applied for probate of the draft of the will in May 1925. The will is alleged to have been lost. Efari, the petitioner, says that she gave the will to Osharam Gaonbura, a relation of the testator, for the purpose of mutation of names in the revenue register after the death of the testator. Osharam never returned the will to her and she never asked for it, but when the disputes arose, she sent a registered notice to him to make over the original will to her. The registered letter containing the notice was not accepted by Osharam and was returned to the petitioner. Osharam also did not give the original will to her and it is on that account that she has asked for probate of the draft from which the will was written out and executed by the testator. The objectrix, Podei, denied the execution of the will and she supported her allegation by her own evidence as well as the evidence of her witnesses. The learned Judge was of opinion that Jipati did execute a will in terms of the draft but he held that after the birth of his son, Kali Charan, he would probably have wished to revoke the will or to modify its terms and he could have revoked the will by simply tearing it up. He apparently came to the conclusion that that was what the testator himself did.

The learned Judge then discussed the evidence as to the existence of the will after the death of Jipati, which fact he noticed is only supported by the evidence of Efari herself and by the evidence of a witness named Adhiram. The learned Judge holds that Adhiram is not a reliable witness and he does not believe the story that Efari made over the will to Osharam as she alleges, the learned Judge being of opinion that it is unlikely that Efari would have left the will with Osharam for some 15 years. He also refers to the fact that there is no mention of the will in the patta and, in his view, the record of the three names is probably due merely to the fact that they were in joint possession of all the property of Jipati. He came to the conclusion that the evidence as regards the existence of the will at the time of the testator's death was unreliable and, therefore, refused to grant probate.

The first objection taken on behalf of the petitioner in her appeal is that the question of revocation of the will was improperly decided by the District Judge, as that was not the issue raised by the objectrix nor was any evidence led in support of that story. The whole question on which the parties went to trial was : Was there a will executed or not ? The learned Judge having found that the will was executed, he ought to have placed the burden of proof upon the objectrix to show that the will had been revoked by the testator. The mere fact that a son had been born to the testator after the date of the execution of the will is not sufficient to raise the presumption that the will was revoked. The contention on behalf of the appellant is therefore that at any rate the case should be remanded to the lower Court for the purpose of a fuller enquiry as to the question of revocation. In answer to the contention of the appellant, the respondent submits that the question of revocation although not distinctly raised in the issues was sufficiently raised in the pleadings of the parties. It is pointed out to us that in the petition of the appellant herself it is stated that Kali Charan, the son of the testator, was born in 1316 B. S., in the month of Pous. The will was, however, not revoked. In answer to that, the objectrix states that according to the draft filed it is clear that the late Jipati had no son of his then, but on the birth of his son he would never keep any such will outstanding.

However inartistic these statements may be it cannot be said that upon these allegations the Judge was not justified in going into the question of revocation of the will by the testator on the birth of his son. The point next urged on behalf of the appellant is that if it is shown that the will was in the possession of the testator till the time of his death, then only the loss may be referred to the presumption of revocation by the testator himself. If it is shown that the will was not in the possession of the testator up to the time of his death, no such presumption of revocation by the testator arises. In support of this contention he relies upon the cases of Sarat Chandra Basack v. Golap Sundari Dasya (1) and Anwar Hossein v. Secretary of State (2).

(2) [1904] 31 Cal. 885=8 C. W. N. 821.

The contention is that the burden of proof is upon the objectrix to show that the will was actually in the possession of the testator till his death. It seems to me that the question as to the presumption of the will being revoked by the testator with reference to the fact of its being in his possession till the time of his death is to be decided more or less upon the circumstances of each case. In my opinion, it cannot be laid down as a rule of law, that under certain circumstances a presumption should be made that the will was revoked by the testator or not. I may refer to the case of Allan v. Morrison (3), which was cited by the learned advocate on behalf of the respondent in support of this proposition. It seems to me, however, that the present controversy should be decided on the terms of S. 237, Indian Succession Act of 1925—which corresponds to the repealed S. 24, Probate and Administration Act 5, 1881. The section runs thus :

When a will has been lost or mislaid since the testator's death . . . and a copy or the draft of the will has been preserved, probate may be granted of such copy or draft, limited until the original or a properly authenticated copy of it is produced.

In this case the petitioner asks for probate of the draft of the will. She must, therefore, prove that the will has been lost or mislaid since the testator's death. The petitioner gave her evidence in support of the allegation that the will was in existence after the testator's death and it has since been lost. Her story is that the will was in the possession of the testator for two years after its execution. Then it was made over to her and she made it over to Osharam for the purpose of mutation of names. This story has not been accepted by the District Judge. If this story is believed, then there is no question, as is admitted on behalf of the respondent, that the appellant would be entitled to the grant asked for. But is this story probable? The first difficulty which arises in believing this story is, why should the testator make over the will to the daughter instead of to his wife, and even if he did so, is it natural that he should not ask it back after the birth of his son who would be left destitute under the terms of the will? The story also of the petitioner having made over the will to Osharam is incredible, and Osharam swears that it was never made over to him. If that story falls to the ground, then the petitioner has not been able to prove that the will has been lost or mislaid since the testator's death. That being so she has failed to satisfy the terms of S. 237, Indian Succession Act, and is, therefore, not entitled to probate. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

Criminal Appeals No. 531, 558 and 572 of 1926, Decided on 7th December 1927, from order of Addl. Sess. Judge, Dacca, D/- 14th June 1926.

Penal Code, S. 400—The essence of the section is the agreement habitually to commit dacoity, not the actual commission or attempted commission of dacoities — The existence of such an agreement and the participation of any person in that agreement may be inferred from the circumstances.

The word "belong" in S. 400 implies something more than a casual association. It involves the idea of continuity rather than of permanency and also of a connexion extending long enough to warrant the inference that the accused has identified himself with the gang which has for its object the habitual commission of dacoity. The essence of the section is the agreement habitually to commit dacoity not the actual commission or attempted commission of dacoities. The existence of such an agreement and the participation of any person in that agreement may be inferred from circumstances. [P 311 C 2]

Suresh Chandra Taluqdar and Sachindra Kumar Roy, Debendra Narain Bhattacharjee and Negendra Nath Chowdhary*—for Appellants.

Khundkar—for the Crown.

Chotzner, J. — The 20 appellants were tried by the Additional Sessions Judge of Dacca with a jury upon a charge under S. 400, I. P. C., and upon the unanimous verdict of the jury were convicted and sentenced to various terms of imprisonment. The trial presents some unusual features. It began on 15th April 1925 and ended on 9th June 1926. Over 300 witnesses were examined and the amount of judicial time actually devoted to the hearing was 154 days. The learned Judge's charge to the jury which occupied 8 days dealt very exhaustively with the law and with the facts in their relation to each particular accused and reflects great credit on the patience, industry and carefulness of the learned Judge.

At the hearing of the appeal, the appellants Suresh Chandra Banerji alias Fatik, Bhim Dhupi, Gunga Charan Dutt alias Haridas, Abala Ranjan Majumdar, Nalini Ranjan Majumdar and Bama Charan Chaudhuri alias Tuina were represented by Mr. Taluqdar, Nripendra Nath Ghose alias Natu by Mr. Bhattacharjee, while the remaining (13) accused have preferred appeals from jail.

The case for the prosecution rests very largely on the evidence of the approver Surendra Mohan Ghose. According to him the appellants with others formed a gang of dacoits under the leadership of Fatik, he himself being one of Fatik's lieutenants. The scene of their operations was the districts of Dacca, Faridpur and Tippera and more particularly Bikrampur within the Munshiganj Sub-Division and they were responsible for no fewer than 18 dacoities exclusive of attempts in the years 1922 and 1923. The head-quarters of the gang was at Panchgaon, Fatik's home, and the evidence shows that the appellants for the most part reside in this area. It was, therefore, not improbable, as the learned Judge puts it, that :

there should be a gang operating in this area which has been responsible for all these dacoities.

This was supported by the fact that similar weapons and the same password were used in their commission. Evidence was also led that the accused were seen to associate together regularly—a truly remarkable circumstance when it is seen that they profess different faiths and occupy a different status in life. Such associations are shown to have been attended by an outbreak of crime, which coincided with the simultaneous disappearance of the accused from their homes.

These being the broad facts of the prosecution, it has now to be considered whether the learned Judge was right in his direction to the jury as to the value of the approver's evidence and as to that corroboration in relation to each accused upon which the statute insists. What the learned Judge says is this :

With regard to the evidence of an approver the legal position may be summed up in one sentence. It is not illegal to convict on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, but it is highly unsafe to do so unless it is corroborated in material particulars. Under S. 133, Evidence Act, it is stated that 'an accomplice shall be a competent witness against an accused person ; and a conviction is not illegal merely because it proceeds upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice.' In S. 114, Ill. (b) it is stated that 'a Court may presume that an accomplice is unworthy of credit unless he is corroborated in material particulars'. You may take it then that there is nothing in the law to prevent you from convicting the accused in this case on the uncorroborated evidence of the approver Surendra Mohan Ghosh, but it would be exceedingly dangerous for you to do so. There must be corroboration of his evidence in material particulars by impartial and reliable evidence. Corroboration by an accomplice is worthless, as is corroboration by a witness whose competence or truthfulness is under suspicion. Evidence in corroboration must be independent testimony which affects the accused by connecting or tending to connect them with the dacoities. In other words it must be evidence which implicates them, confirming in some material particular not only the evidence that dacoities have been committed but that the accused were concerned in their commission. If an approver has been corroborated on some points you are free to believe him on points on which he has not been corroborated provided you think it reasonable. It is not necessary that an approver shall be corroborated as regards every single statement which he makes.

We think that this is substantially a correct exposition of the law. It has, however, been contended by Mr. Taluqdar that the learned Judge should have placed the character and antecedents of the approver much more elaborately before the jury and that his omission to do so is a serious defect in the charge. We find it difficult to accept this contention. The approver was before the jury for 24 days, and a mere perusal of his evidence is sufficient to show that he must have blackened himself in their eyes beyond redemption. Then on the question of the corroboration of the approver's evidence by independent testimony we cannot do better than transcribe as an example of the learned Judge's method of dealing with each individual accused that portion of the charge which relates to the case against Ananta Sarcar :

2 Ananta Sarcar—Ananta Sarcar is said to be the lieutenant of Fatik. He is first mentioned in connexion with the Kamarhowla dacoity. You will remember that he used to be the tabirkar of the master of the house. Vide evidence of Nisi Karmokar. Then his name appears in connexion with the Bidhna dacoity, and the search in his house by the police. He is implicated by the approver in the Meheran dacoity, and Kalachand Banerji speaks of the improvement in his fortunes after this dacoity. In Gaodia dacoity he is again implicated by the approver, this time as the informer of the dacoity. I remind you of the evidence of Baroda Kanta Pal, Kala Chand Gope, Tufani Kapali, and Srinath Gope. In this dacoity the approver gives Ananta a specific part, in that he was armed with a ballam and struck a man who cried out in consequence of which episode a neighbour asked whether or not these dacoits had any pity. Suren also implicates him in the Abdullapur attempt. He is named in the Mankohati dacoity, and the approver's evidence is supplemented by that of Kala Chand and Kasimali Haldar, P. Ws. 210 and 246. He is also named by Suren as having taken part in the Radhanagar dacoity and the evidence of Suren is supplemented by that of Jitendra Nath Roy P. W. 288 and Abdul Aziz P. W. 72. He is implicated by the approver in all the Kuichamora attempts and in the last his evidence is supplemented by that of Kalachand Gope, and by Badidzaman P. W. 76. Suren names him in the Banori dacoity, and you also have the evidence of Maijuddin Mullah 252, and Janaki Kapali 256; Suren names him in the Banori dacoity, and you also have the evidence of Sasadhar Biswas 296. As regards Banori dacoity there is also the evidence of Ex. 198, and the evidence of Kala Chand 210. Suren names him in the Ganganagar dacoity and there is also the evidence of Brojendra Lal De 230. As regards Wari dacoity there is the evidence of Satinath Banerji 3, and Peari Kapali 245. Ananta was arrested by Eadali Chowkidar on 14th October 1923 and was produced before Sasadhar Biswas.

The same remarks as I have made in connexion with the witnesses of association before apply here as well as in all the individual cases. As regards Ananta, the evidence of the following association witnesses is put before you. Kala Chand 210, Eadali 37, Janaki Kapali 256, Dinesh Bannerji 262, Mon Mohan Kapali 244, Abbas Ali 258, Nisi Karmakar 251, Moijuddin 252, Gagan Karikar 248, Peari Kapali 245, Kasimali Haldar 246, Srinath Gope 253, Tufani Kapali 247, Manindra Nath Mukerji 264, Oli-muddin Choukidar 243, Indra Mohan De 265, Mohini Mohan Banerjee 211, Hem Ghatak 291 and Kala Chand Banerjee 272, with reference to this last witness, I remind you of the evidence of P. W. 37 as regards enmity alleged between him and the accused Ananta.

The learned Judge has dealt with the other accused in a precisely similar manner and we do not think a clearer or fuller direction could have been given. The culpability or innocence of each individual was left entirely to the jury and we cannot say that the evidence upon which they found the accused guilty was inadequate. We have now to consider the various arguments advanced by Mr. Taluqdar. He says that S. 400 contemplates the existence of one gang to which the members permanently belong and are associated for the purpose of habitually committing dacoity. Here the case for the prosecution is that there are three distinct gangs, and it is, therefore, urged that the trial has been vitiated by the acceptance of evidence relating to these three gangs, each of which should have been separately tried.

Now it is quite true to say as the learned Judge has done that when the section says "whoever shall belong to a gang of persons," the word "belong" implies something more than a casual association. It involves the idea of continuity rather than of permanency and also of a connexion extending long enough to warrant the inference that the accused had identified himself with the gang which has for its object the habitual commission of dacoity to use the learned Judge's words, is the agreement habitually to commit dacoity, not the actual commission or attempted commission of dacoities. The existence of such an agreement and the participation of any person in that agreement may be inferred from circumstances.

The essence of the section,

When the evidence is examined it will appear that it was only one gang which was charged and proved and that the approver and the appellant Natu joined it in time for the Meheran dacoity in December, 1922. Consequently there is no question of misreception of evidence or misjoinder of charges on the ground that the three gangs have been intermingled. In point of fact the first group of dacoities, namely Dhamaron and Maloleiya affects none of the appellants except Natu with whom we shall deal later. There is, therefore no force, in this argument.

It is next contended that the learned Judge has misdirected the jury in regard to the letter Ex. 10, which purports to have been written by the approver to his wife and to show that he is not really a dacoit but a spy in police pay. What the learned Judge says about it is this:

At the close of the cross-examination of the approver he was handed this letter and was asked whether or not it had been written by him. After seeing the letter he answered—it is not in my hand-writing and not written by me. The letter was marked provisionally 'X'. Then the approver was asked to write at the dictation of the then pleader for the defence who was then in conduct of the case. Accordingly he wrote at the dictation of the learned pleader. Two other letters purporting to have been written to the approver by his wife were shown to him. He denied that they were in the handwriting of his wife, that he had ever received them and stated that his wife always wrote to him over the signature 'Bini'. Nothing more was heard of the letter purporting to have been written by Suren to his wife until the argument of the learned pleader for the defence. He has now asked you to compare the admitted handwriting as shown in the dictation taken down, with that of the letter purporting to have been written by Suren, and also with the entries in the Khota book of Ram Malakar, Exs. 3 and 4 of Ex. 1 and from this comparison to find that the letter in question was actually written by Suren from the gaol. In the first place I must caution you evidence of comparison of handwriting is often extremely dangerous. Of all methods of proving a document that of comparison of handwriting by an inexperienced witness is the most unsatisfactory. Your own common sense will tell you this. If a man wishes to forge a document and make it appear to be in the handwriting of another, then he will naturally follow as closely as possible the peculiar characteristics of the other's handwriting. He will also imitate any peculiarities of expression. If he knows that the other person is in the habit of using certain expressions or of making certain mistakes in spelling, he will introduce them into the forgery in order to provide an appearance of genuineness in the forgery. In fact the essence of a successful forgery is that it should resemble the original as closely as possible. The better the forgery the more difficult it is for any person who is not a handwriting expert to distinguish it from a genuine script. In the present case the alleged writer of the letter says it is a forgery, is not written by him. The defence have asked you to compare it with his admitted handwriting and find it genuine. It is a point which is for your decision, but your decision must be made bearing in mind the caution that I have given you.

We are of opinion that the warning given to the jury was quite proper. It was plainly a matter for the jury to decide whether the letter was genuine or not and if the defence maintained it was, nothing could have been simpler than for them to have called an expert to tell them what he thought. A grievance is sought to be made from the fact that the wife was not examined, but here again the defence might have summoned her if they wanted her.

Some criticism is directed against the way in which the search of Fatik's house was conducted and it is urged that all the witnesses to the search were not called.

The search list Ex. 122 shows that a very large number of articles were found and it was important that they should be carefully recorded with all particulars. There is, therefore, nothing suspicious in the fact that this took more than one day to do.

As regards the second point, it appears that the search took place in the presence of three witnesses one of whom was examined. It was plainly unnecessary to call every witness. It would be for the jury to say if they were satisfied upon his evidence that there was no reason to suspect any irregularity, and whether they were or were not, there was no reason to burden the record unduly.

The further suggestion made by the learned vakil that some of the articles which were identified as stolen property at the trial were planted in Fatik's house rests on no evidence and is apparently unfounded. (The judgment then considered the evidence in the case of each accused and with certain modifications in sentences the appeals were dismissed).

Appeals Nos. 2437 to 2442 of 1924, Decided on 6th July 1927, from appellate decrees of the 1st Sub-Judge, Sylhet, D/- 23rd June 1924.

(a) Evidence Act, S. 115—Landlord and tenant.

Where the tenancy under the plaintiff is once denied, the tenants would not be entitled to claim on a future occasion that the tenancy under the plaintiff was subsisting.

(b) Landlord and tenant—Forfeiture arises only when the tenant expressly repudiates the tenancy.

The principle of forfeiture by disclaimer is that where the tenant denies the landlord's title to recover rent from him bona fide on the ground of seeking information of such title or having such title established in a Court of law in order to protect himself, he is not to be charged with disclaiming the landlord's title. But where the disclaimer is done not with this object but with an express repudiation of the tenancy under the landlord, it would operate as forfeiture. [P 315 C 1]

(c) Transfer of Property Act, S. 111—Forfeiture may arise even when tenant does not deny tenancy but sets up title of third person.

The English law of forfeiture has been assimilated with the law of transfer in India and has been embodied in S. 111, Cl. (g), where one of the grounds for forfeiture is said to be setting up by the lessee a title in a third person. This indicates the principle of law that a tenancy may suffer forfeiture even though the tenant may not deny his tenancy but sets up the title of a third person : *A. I. R. 1919 P. Judgment.—These six appeals are by the defendants in suits for ejectment. It is not necessary to deal with the various points involved in the suits as the only question that has been raised and discussed before us is whether in the circumstances of these cases there was a forfeiture of the tenancies by disclaimer by the defendants. It appears that there was a separate Hisya No. 14 of Taluk No. 27 under Cheak No. 5 of the Thak Map. It stood in the name of one Amirunnessa and was subsequently sold for arrears of revenue and purchased by the present plaintiff. He previously brought suits for rent against these defendants but they having denied the relationship of landlord and tenant between him and themselves he had to withdraw the suits. He then brought the present suits for recovery of khas possession on the ground that the repudiation by the defendants of the relationship of landlord and tenant between him and them operated as a forfeiture of the tenancies, if they had any. The main defence of the defendant was that the lands did not belong to the plaintiff's Taluk No. 27 but that they belonged to the Maliks of Taluks Nos. 8, 28, 30 and 32 under whom they were holding and that they were never the tenants of the plaintiff or his predecessor the owner of Taluk No. 27. The first Court found that lands in suit appertained to Taluk No. 27 but that the defendants were bona fide tenants of the lands and that the disclaimer in the previous suit was not sufficient in law for forfeiture of the tenancies. In this view it dismissed the plaintiff's suits. The learned Subordinate Judge in appeal has dissented from the view taken by the Munsif on fact as well as on law and holding that the disclaimer was sufficient in law to operate as forfeiture he decreed the plaintiff's suits. Against the decision of the lower appellate Court the defendants have appealed and it is argued on their behalf that the allegations made by the defendants in their written statements in the previous suit did not amount to a disclaimer such as to work forfeiture of the tenancy. In the previous suits for rent the defendants filed written statements of which a translation has been placed before us by the learned vakil for the appellants in which they said that the suits were not maintainable as there was no relationship of landlord and tenant between the plaintiff or his predecessors and the defendants and that the real owners of the lands in suit were persons whose names were mentioned in para. 4 of the written statement. In para. 10 of the written statement the defendants gave a series of denials to all the allegations made by the plaintiff and characterized the plaintiff's claim as totally false, imaginary, collusive and fraudulent. The essence of the defence in that suit was that the defendants were not the tenants of the plaintiffs or his predecessors in respect of Taluk No. 27, that the lands belonged to the other taluks and that they were holding the lands under the owners of those taluks. The learned Subordinate Judge records the following findings :

There is nothing to hold that the defendants hold the lands of Taluk No. 27 as bona fide tenants for upwards of 12 years. There can be no doubt that the defendants were the tenants of the plaintiffs: so the plaintiff, a bonafide purchaser, is entitled to recover khas possession and wasilat from the defendants who in collusion with the Maliks of other Taluks set up a hostile title and denied the plaintiff's right. If the defendants would be bona fide tenants of the lands by taking patta from the Maliks of taluks Nos. 8, 28, 30 and 32 then defence would be a plausible one. But they are in collusion with their alleged landlords and persist in setting up adverse right even after the previous decision which bind their alleged landlords as well as the defendants.

It may be noticed here that there was a previous suit between the alleged landlords of the defendants and the plaintiff's predecessors with regard to the lands in suit which was finally decided by the High Court and in which it was held that the lands in suit belonged to Taluk No. 27. On these findings all the learned discussion on the abstract question how far a disclaimer operates as forfeiture hardly arises. The findings come to this, that the defendants have not acquired any permanent right in the lands but have been in possession of these lands in collusion with the Maliks of the other taluks not as bonafide tenants but in order to deprive the plaintiff of his land.

The learned vakil for the appellants, however, contends that in law in order that a disclaimer should operate as forfeiture it should be a disclaimer of the tenancy in general and setting up of an adverse right by the tenant in himself. In other words if the tenant denies the relationship of landlord and tenant between the plaintiff and himself and sets up a third person as his landlord, claiming and not renouncing the status of a tenant, there is no forfeiture of the tenancy in law. It is conceded that under the law prevalent in the province from which this case comes the denial of the landlord's right works forfeiture on the analogy of the English law on the subject: see the case of Nizamuddin v. Mamta-zuddin (1). In support of the broad proposition that has been placed before us by the learned vakil for the appellant we have been pressed with the decision in H. Mathewson v. Jadu Mahto (2). That case on a close examination does not support the appellants' contention. In that case the defendant in the previous suit had stated that he was not aware of the plaintiff's predecessor-in-title having any interest in the land, that the decree, auction-sale and kobala on which the plaintiff based his claim were collusive and fraudulent and that he had a jungle-bari right in the land. In his evidence the defendant said:

I have no relationship of landlord and tenant with Mr. Mathewson the plaintiff in the suit. I owe no money to him. I am a tenant of Lalit Ghose to whom I pay rent.

With regard to the defence stated in the written statement the learned Judges held following the English law on the point and the decisions of this Court that it did not amount to a disclaimer operating as forfeiture in as much as the tenant sought information, with regard to the strength of the plaintiff's title. With reference to the statement made in the cause of his deposition by the defendant the learned Judges seem to be of opinion that it might have entailed forfeiture but in that case they did not say so because they could not trust the memorandum on the record of the tenant's deposition in that case as it was not in conformity with the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code. That case, therefore, does not support the appellants' contention. The rule with reference to this branch of the English law has been explained by Parke, B., in Deod Gray v. Stanion (3). At p. 702 the learned Baron observes thus:

A disavow by the tenant of the holding under the particular landlord, by words only, is sufficient.

In explanation of this dictum the learned Baron adds:

But in order to make a verbal or written disclaimer sufficient, it must amount to a direct repudiation of the relation of landlord and tenant or, to a distinct claim to hold possession of the estate, upon a ground wholly inconsistent with the existence of that relation which by necessary implication is a repudiation of it. An omission to acknowledge the landlord as such, by requesting further information will not be enough.

This rule seems to have been based upon a consideration of not allowing a party to make inconsistent cases at different times by saying that the relationship of landlord and tenant does not exist between the plaintiff and the defendant and then saying on a future occasion that he was a tenant on the land and that he was willing to treat the plaintiff as the landlord and should not therefore, be ejected from the land. Some English authorities have held in these circumstances that the defendant is estopped. There have been several cases on this point in this Court and all of them followed the principle that when the tenancy was denied under the plaintiff he should not be entitled to claim on a future occasion that the tenancy under the plaintiff was subsisting. The cases which deal with this point are mostly cases under the Bengal Tenancy Act, where the defence of the tenant repudiating the tenancy has been given effect to by the decree of the Court. In such cases, as has been held in Ekambar v. Hara Bewa (4), the principle of res judicata comes into play. But the principle seems to be the same in cases where the defence has succeeded and in cases where the plaintiff had to abandon the suit on account of the defendants' defence; for in one case the decision in the previous suit operates as an estoppel by judgment and in the other case the denial estops the defendant from taking an inconsistent position in a subsequent suit. The principle governing the law of forfeiture by disclaimer has been considered in many cases. See the cases of Mallika Dasi v. Makhan Lal Chowdhury (5), Pratap Narain Mukherjee v. Biraj Dasi (6) and Annada Charan Dutt v. Mohim Chandra Ghua (7). The principle to be deduced from all these cases is that where the tenant denies the plaintiff's title to recover rent from him bona fide on the ground of seeking information of such title or having such title established in a Court of law in order to protect himself, he is not to be charged with disclaiming the plaintiff's title. But where the disclaimer is done not with this object but with an express repudiation of the tenancy under the plaintiff, it would operate as forfeiture. One of the cases on this point, namely, the case of Miadhur v. Rajani Kanta Roy (8), throws some light on the question which has been canvassed before us. There the defendant in a suit for rent had denied the plaintiff's title and claimed to hold under a third party. It was held that in a suit for ejectment by the landlord the defendant was debarred from pleading his tenancy and claiming possession on that ground. Though it was a case under the Bengal Tenancy Act and the plaintiff's previous suit for rent was dismissed on the defendant's objection, the principle underlying the decision in that case is applicable to the present case.

But the question may be looked at from another standpoint. In the present case it has been found by the lower appellate Court that the defendants' title had not been perfected by 12 years possession. They are at best non-occupancy raiyats with all the incidents of tenancy-at-will. As has been pointed out in the case of Maharaja of Jeypur v. Rukmini Pattamahadevi (9) quoting from the judgment in an English case, that denial or disclaimer by a tenant of this character need not be held to work a forfeiture, the holding being subject to the mutual will of landlord and tenant to determine it on giving the usual notice, evidence of a disclaimer in evidence of an election to put an end to the tenancy and supersede the necessity for such notice.

On the authorities and on a common sense view of the matter, we are not prepared to accept the contention of the appellant that if the tenant does not claim a right in himself and admits tenancy under a third party, he cannot be sued as a trespasser. The English law of forfeiture has been assimilated with the law of transfer in this country and has been embodied in S. 111, Cl. (G), T. P. Act. where one of the grounds for forfeiture is said to be setting up by the lessee a title in a third person. This indicates the principle of law that a tenancy may suffer forfeiture even though the tenant may not deny his tenancy but sets up the title of a third person.

The findings of the lower appellate Court in this case are strong enough to maintain the decree passed by that Court. They are that the defendants are not bona fide tenants, that they colluded with the Maliks of the adjoining taluks to deprive the plaintiff of the lands of which he was owner and they persisted in setting up adverse title even after the decision in the previous litigation between the landlord of taluk No. 27 and the landlords of the other taluks which was binding on the landlords now set up by the defendants. It has not been found that the defendants are bona fide tenants of the land and have any right to remain on the lands. Apart from the question of forfeiture of tenancy, in the view taken by the lower appellate Court it seems that the defendants had no such tenancy as to be terminated by forfeiture.

In the result we hold that the decision of the lower appellate Court on the facts found by it is correct and these appeals are dismissed with costs.

(a) Civil P. C., S. 100—The proper effect of a proved fact is a question of law.

The proper effect of a proved fact is a question of law, and the question whether a tenancy is permanent or precarious seems to be a legal inference from facts and not itself a question of fact and, therefore, a second appeal lies from it : A. I. R. 1927 P. C. 102 (P. C.), Ref. [P 317 C 1]

(b) Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 88—Receipt of rent by the agent—Landlord is not bound by every statement therein—Landlord and tenant.

It cannot be affirmed as a general proposition of law that a landlord is always bound by every statement given in the receipts of rent by the gomastha. When an agent of the landlord has accepted from the various tenants in the occupation of a holding at one rental, proportionate parts of the rents, it does not bind the landlord to recognize a separation of the tenancy in absence of evidence to connect the landlord with the receipt of any proportionate rate of rent by the agent : *6 C. (c) Landlord and tenant—Suit for ejectment—Tenant setting up defence that he has a right of permanent tenancy must prove that he has such right—Evidence Act, S. 101.

It cannot now be doubted that when a tenant of lands in India, in a suit by his landlord to eject him from them, sets up a defence that he has a right of permanent tenancy in the lands, the onus of proving that he has such right is upon the tenant : *A. (d) Landlord and tenant—Four holdings amalgamated into one, three holdings being tenancies-at-will—Fourth holding a permanent tenure—Facts that an unaltered rent has been paid for 57 years and that there existed a pucca building on a small portion of it at some distant time are sufficient to make the amalgamated holding a permanent tenure.

Four holdings were amalgamated into one holding. From among them, the first, second and third holdings were tenancies-at-will at the time and the fourth was a permanent holding. The position of the consolidated holding was that an unaltered rent had been paid for 57 years and there existed a pucca building on a small portion of it at some distant time.

Held : that the mere fact of amalgamation of four holdings into one would not change the respective incidents of the holdings in the absence of a contract to the effect that it was intended to change these incidents and give a higher status to the tenant of the amalgamated holding. The fact of unaltered rent and existence of a pucca structure on a portion are not sufficient to raise the inference of permanency : *A. I. R. 1924 P. C. 65 ; 16 Cal. 223 (P. Brojo Lal Chakraburty and Suresh Chandra Talukdar—for Respondents.

Judgment.—The suit in which this appeal arises was for ejectment of the respondents from some 25 cattas of land in Punjab Nayabasti, within the municipal boundaries of Calcutta. The plaintiff-appellant alleges in his plaint that the defendants-respondents are tenants-at-will liable to ejectment on a proper notice to quit and that such notice had been served upon the defendants' predecessor one Biseswar Roy Choudhury.

The claim of the respondents is that the disputed land has been held by them and their predecessors on a permanent tenure and that no notice to quit was served on them.

The Munsif of Alipur who tried the suit held that the notice to quit was properly served but decided in favour of the respondents on the ground that the respondents' tenure is permanent. The plaintiff appealed to the Subordinate Judge of 24 Pargannas who came to the conclusion that the holding in suit is permanent and that the defendants are not liable to ejectment and on this finding dismissed the plaintiff's appeal.

In second appeal the learned advocate on behalf of the plaintiff-appellant contends that the findings of fact arrived at by the lower appellate Court do not give rise to the legal inference that the tenure of the respondents is a permanent tenure. It has not been seriously contended before us by the learned vakil for the respondents that the findings of the Subordinate Judge that the respondents' tenancy was permanent, was one of fact and was binding on us in second appeal ; nor could such contention be successfully raised. The question here, as in all other similar cases, is whether the true inference from the facts is that the tenure is permanent or precarious, the burden of proof being on the tenants respondents. In this connexion I need only refer to the following observations of the Judicial Committee in a recent case.

A third question, more formidable in character, must be disposed of before their Lordships further proceed. The learned District Judge on appeal here, dismissed the respondent's suit, finding that the appellants' tenancy was permanent. It is, therefore, contended by the appellants that this finding was one of fact by the learned Judge not open to review either by the High Court on second appeal or by this Board. Now their Lordships would be the last to seek to abridge the effect of Ss. 100 and 101, Civil P. C., or weaken the strict rule that on second appeal the appellate Court is bound by the findings of fact of the Court below.

They are well aware, moreover, that questions of law and of fact are often difficult to disentangle. It is clear, however, that the proper effect of a proved fact is a question of law, and the question whether a tenancy is permanent or precarious seems to them, in a case like the present, to be a legal inference from facts and not itself a question of fact. The High Court has described the question here as a mixed question of law and fact, a phrase not unhappy if it carries with it the warning that, in so far as it depends upon fact, the finding of the Court on first appeal must be accepted. On these lines, which the High Court appear strictly to have observed, the appeal to that Court was competent and it was in their Lordships' judgment open to the learned Judges there to entertain it as they did : See Dhanna Mal v. Moti Sagar (1).

The facts found by the lower appellate Court are these : The disputed land which is now one holding originally consisted of 4 separate holdings which were subsequently amalgamated into one. The area of land, the name of the tenant and the rental payable for each holding are given in the table below.

Tenant.	Land.	Rent.
		Rs.	As.	Gds.	K.
1. Jagannath Mistry.	7½ Cattas	3	1	1	1
2. Abhoy Charan Shah	16 "	12	0	0	0
3. Sreenath Sarkar	1½ "	1	1	1	1
4. Gopal Bairagi.	½ "	1	4	0	0

The date of creation of the first of these holdings is unknown. The other three tenancies were created after 1258 B. S. (1851 A. D.) and before 1268 B. S. (1861 A. D.). The last two holdings were amalgamated in 1268 when the rent was increased to Rs. 2-8-annas. The rent of the second holding was increased to Rs. 24 in 1265 B. S. (1858 A. D.) and the rent of the first holding was increased to Rs. 10 in 1261 B. S. (1864 A. D.). There has been no change in the rental of any of these four holdings since 1271 B. S. (1864 A. D.). On the 6th of Aghrayan 1289 B. S. (1882 A. D.) defendants' predecessor Barada Kanta Roy purchased these holdings from Anandamoyi, Dasi, wife of the tenant Abhoy Charan Saha in the benami of Rakhal Chandra Mukherjee. Biseswar was the son of Barada Kanta Roy and the defendants are the sons of Biseswar. Notice to quit was served on Biseswar by the plaintiff. The conveyance in favour of Anandamoyi from the original tenant of these four holdings has not been produced in this case. But the conveyance in favour of Barada by Anandamoyi. Ex. "B" shows that the four holdings were regarded as two ; one was the amalgamation of holdings 1, 3 and 4 with the consolidated increased rental of Rs. 12-8-annas and the other was holding No. 2 with the increased rental of Rs. 24. In Ex. B holdings were described as Kayami Mourashi (Permanent). Ex. B also shows that the second holding of 16 cattas was Anandamoyi's dwelling house and that she had one pucca one-storied house on the same ; besides there was one "Golepata" hut on the amalgamated holdings of Rs. 12-8. The lower appellate Court also referred to certain dakhilas (rent receipts from 1295 B. S. (1888 A. D.) to 1303 B. S. (1896 A. D.). In each of those dakhilas there is an entry made by the gomastha of the plaintiff that the holding was a mokarari mourashi one. No document has been produced in this case to show to what extent the gomastha had authority to bind the plaintiff by an admission of the kind made in the dakhilas as to the permanent character of the holding in question.

If these admissions can be regarded as admissions made by or on behalf of the plaintiff they would be very strong evidence in support of the defendants' case. Apparently it was considered in the lower Court that unless the plaintiff could displace the statements of his gomastha by showing his ignorance of their being made his case would be defeated or seriously damaged. Indeed the lower appellate Court goes to the length of holding that the statement in the dakhilas would conclusively prove that the holding is a mokarari mourashi holding. Although there is a column in the rent receipts showing the nature of the tenancy, in cases governed by the Transfer of Property Act, it is not usual to indicate the nature of the tenancy in the rent receipts. The admission made by the gomastha was a gratuitous admission and, may be withdrawn unless there is some obligation not to withdraw it. Ordinarily the gomastha is authorized to receive rents, to give a discharge to tenants for such rents and in some cases even to recognize the transferee of an occupancy holding but it certainly is not usual for a gomastha to confer any permanent right on tenants or to make any admission in respect of tenants' right which may be binding on the landlord. It is true the landlord might have proved the extent of the authority of his gomastha but in the absence of such authority it cannot be laid down as an inflexible rule that the presumption must be that the gomastha had authority for doing everything which he may do even to the detriment of his master in connexion with matters which are not properly within the scope of his employment. In this case a former Naib of the plaintiff deposed that the gomastha had no authority for writing the words "moharari mourashi" in the rent receipts. The lower appellate Court does not refer to this evidence. All that it says is that the onus lay on the plaintiff to prove the extent of his gomastha's authority as that fact was within the special knowledge of the plaintiff and the plaintiff has not proved it and he presumes from this that the gomastha had authority to give the description in the dakhilas as to the permanent nature of the tenancy. It cannot be affirmed as a general proposition of law that a landlord is always bound by every statement given in the receipts of rent by his gomastha. There are cases in the books which go to show that when an agent of the landlord has accepted from the various tenants in the occupation of a holding at one rental proportionate parts of the rents, it does not bind the landlord to recognize a separation of the tenancy in absence of evidence to connect the landlord with the receipt of any proportionate rate of rent by the agent. See Maharani Beni Pershad v. Goberdhan (2) and Maharani Beni Pershad v. Radhin (3).

In the case of Bhojohurree v. Aka Golam (4), this Court held that the purchaser of a ryoti tenure is bound to communicate with the zemindar and obtain his consent to the transfer of the tenure; without this being done, a gomastha's receipts of rent are not binding on the zemindar. On the other hand in a Full Bench case Pyari Mohun v. Gopal Paik (5) it was held that a landlord was bound by a receipt given by his agent consenting to a division of the holding and a distribution of the rent payable in respect thereof, within the meaning of S. 88, Ben. Ten. Act. In this Full Bench case it was assumed that the agent was duly authorized to give such a receipt. It seems to me that no inflexible rule of law can be laid down to the effect that the landlord is bound by every statement made in the receipt. It has been conceded by the learned vakil for the respondent in this case that the entry with regard to the nature of the tenancy in a rent receipt would be a superfluous and unnecessary entry in cases of tenancies governed by the Transfer of Property Act. So this admission of the nature of the tenancy by the gomastha as I have already pointed out was a gratuitous admission. There was not here any title on which such an admission can rest. No papers have been produced to show that the landlord before the admission treated the tenancy in question as a permanent tenancy. It is to be noticed, also that this admission of the gomastha is contained in receipts for eight years ending with the year 1896 and since 1896, no receipts were granted because of the dispute between the parties as to the nature of the tenancy. The admission, therefore, being out of the way we have now to consider whether the findings lead to the inference that all these four tenancies aforesaid are permanent tenancies.

Summarizing the findings of the lower appellate Court we find the broad facts to be these:—With regard to the first holding of seven and half cattas the origin is unknown; its rent was enhanced to Rs. 10 in 1271 B. S. It was amalgamated with holdings 3 and 4 some time before 1298 B. S. (1882 A. D.), some "Golepatta" huts stood on this consolidated holding at some time. With regard to holdings 3 and 4 their origin is traceable and they were created between 1258 and 1268 B. S.; they were amalgamated in about 1268 and the rent was increased to Rs. 2-8-0 in about the same time; these two amalgamated holdings were again amalgamated with holdings 1 and 2 in about the year 1289. With regard to holdings 1, 3 and 4 rent had not remained unchanged before 1271 but there has been uniformity of rent since 1271. It does not appear that these three holdings were let for residential purposes; the land is homestead land within the municipality and has been used as an "Arat" i. e. for the purposes of shop. These circumstances alone, namely, unaltered rents for 57 years and one transfer of these holdings are not sufficient to raise the inference of permanency. It has not been shown that the claim of permanent tenure as asserted in Ex. "B" i. e., the kabala by Anandamoyi in favour of defendants' predecessor-in-interest Barada Kristo Roy in the benami of Rakhal Chandra Mukherji was brought home to the knowledge of the appellant or his predecessors-in-title and was acknowledged by them. There are no pucca structures in the land. It has not been shown that they were let for residential purposes. It is not shown that they were being used for residential purposes. And the fact that they were amalgamated with holding 2 on which at one time a pucca structure stood cannot give to these holdings the character of permanency.

In the case of Nainapillai Marakayar v. Ramanathan Chettiar (6), the Judicial Committee laid down the law in regard to the matter in hand in the following words :

It cannot now be doubted that when a tenant of lands in India in a suit by his landlord to eject him from them, sets up a defence that he has a right of permanent tenancy in the lands, the onus of proving that he has such right is upon the tenant. In Secy. of State v. Luchmeswar Singh (7), it was held that the onus of proving that they had a permanent right of occupancy in lands was upon the defendants, who alleged it as a defence to a suit by their landlord to eject them, and that proof of long occupation at a fixed rent did not satisfy that onus.

And again :

A permanent right of occupancy in land in India is a right, subject to certain conditions, of a tenant to hold the land permanently which he occupies. It is a heritable right, and in some places it possibly may be transferable by the tenant to a stranger. That permanent right of occupancy can only be obtained by a tenant by custom, or by a grant from an owner of the land who happens to have power to grant such a right, or under an Act of the Legislature.

Having regard to these pronouncements we are not satisfied that the defendants have satisfied the onus of proving that they have right of permanent tenancy in these holdings.

The learned Vakil for the respondent has relied on two decisions of the Judicial Committee Upendra Krishna Mandal v. Ismail Khan (8) and Nilratan Mandal v. Ismail Khan (9). In the first of these cases the case of the tenants rested on a series of transmissions of properties by sale and mortgage which went back as far as 1826 and the continued possession of the tenants and their predecessors-in-title at an unaltered rent and on a kabuliati which show that these transmissions of property as permanent tenancy was brought home to the landlord who recognized the right created by these documents by accepting a kabuliati. In the second case the land had been occupied by the tenants' predecessors at an unaltered rent for 100 years. They had built on it and have dealt with the property by sale and mortgage. A kabuliati and a patta were executed which brought home to the landlord, knowledge and recognition of the tenants' transmission of the property by sale in an instrument which purported to convey a permanent and inheritable right.

Reliance has been placed by the learned vakil for the respondent on the case of Casperz v. Kedarnath Sarbadhikari (10). That case is also distinguishable. For in that case the following facts co-existed :—

(1) Long possession by the defendants and their predecessors,

(2) the landlord's permission to the defendants' predecessors to build a pucca house upon it ;

(3) the existence of the house there for a considerable time ;

(4) the addition to the building by successive tenants,

(5) the transfers of the tenure from time to time by succession and purchase;

(6) the acquiescence of the landlord in such transfers of which he could not have been ignorant as he accepted rent from the transferees.

So far as holdings 1, 3 and 4 are concerned all these elements do not exist in the present case. For the reasons above stated the legitimate inference to be drawn from the facts in the present case is that with regard to nine cattas of land covered by holdings 1, 3 and 4 the position of the defendants is that of a tenant-at-will.

The case with regard to holding 2 (16 cattas of land) stands on a somewhat different footing from that of other holdings. It appears from the kabala (Ex. B) by which defendants' predecessor Barada Kristo purchased the holdings along with three other holdings from Anandamoyi that this holding was her (i. e. Anandamoyi's) Bhadrasanbati (dwelling house) and that she had one pucca one storied house on this holding. This holding was created between 1258 and 1268 B. S., and we find that sometime before 1289 B. S., there were pucca structures on the holding so that at any rate the inference might be legitimately drawn that the land of this holding which was being used for residential purposes was let for such purposes. The rent had not varied for 57 years and that the transfer was recognized by the landlord and in all the circumstances it may be legitimately inferred that the appellant through his agent had notice of the existence of pucca structure on it. It has been argued on behalf of the appellant that Ex. B is not admissible in evidence against him as he was no party to the said document. But I think that this argument has no substance for the document although not inter partes is admissible in evidence as a transaction within the meaning of S. 13, Evidence Act, by which the right to this property was asserted. So that we have it that the buildings which were of a substantial character were erected so far back as 1882 and that the predecessor-in-title of the defendants lived for sometime in it. In these circumstances it is indeed difficult to say that the inference drawn by the Courts below that this holding 2 is a tenancy of a permanent character, is wrong.

If we consider the incidents of the four holdings together after amalgamation into a single holding we find that an unaltered rent has been paid for 57 years and that there existed a pucca building on a small portion of it at some distant time. These two elements alone are not sufficient to raise the presumption of permanency. But it has been possible in the present case by reason of the evidence furnished by

Ex. "B" to distinguish between the lands of holdings 1, 3 and 4 on which no permanent structures stood and the lands of holding 2 on which such structures existed. The mere fact of amalgamation of four holdings into one would not change the respective incidents of the holdings in the absence of a contract to the effect that it was intended to change those incidents and give a higher status to the tenant of the amalgamated holding. No such contract has been proved in the present case and it is not suggested that any existed. We are, therefore, left to infer from proved facts the nature of the new consolidated tenancy. The fact of unaltered rent and existence of a pucca structure on a portion, as I have already stated, are not sufficient to raise the inference of permanency. It is because of the fact that buildings existed on the 16 cattas holding that we are able to infer that the purpose for which the said land was held was a residential purpose and this fact brings the case within the purview of the decision of Sir Pichard Garth, Chief Justice, in the case of Gangadhar v. Ayimuddin (11), which was cited on behalf of the respondent.

The result, therefore, is, that the decrees of the Courts below are set aside and in lieu thereof there will be a decree in favour of the plaintiff for ejectment from the nine cattas of land covered by the holdings 1, 3 and 4. The claim of the plaintiff for ejectment from holding 2 (16 cattas of land) will be dismissed.

The plaintiff will be entitled to mesne profits from the date on which the tenancy was determined by notice to quit. The mesne profits will be ascertained in the execution Court.

Each party will bear their costs throughout.

Criminal Revision No. 1328 of 1927, Decided on 24th February 1928.

(a) Calcutta Municipal Act (1923), S. 406 and 488—Accused found taking delivery of consignment of ghee discovered to be adulterated is not guilty of offence under S. 406.

An accused was found by a Food Inspector unloading a consignment at a railway station. One of the tins which the accused said, contained ghee, appeared to the Food Inspector to contain something else. He accordingly seized the consignment and took it to the Municipal Office. Thereafter he purchased for a sum of four annas a sample of one of the tins for analysis and the analysis when made disclosed the fact that the ghee was grossly adulterated. Upon these facts, the accused was convicted.

Held: that he could not be convicted of an offence under S. 406. [P 321 C 2]

Judgment.—The petitioner has been convicted under S. 406 read with S. 488, Calcutta Municipal Act of 1923. S. 406 says:

No person shall directly or indirectly himself or by any other person on his behalf sell, expose or hawk about for sale or manufacture or store for sale any food or drug which is adulterated or misbranded.

According to the judgment of the learned Magistrate, the accused was found by the Food Inspector unloading a consignment of 16 tins at the Sealdah Railway Parcel Office. One of these tins which the petitioner said contained ghee appeared to the Food Inspector to contain something else. He accordingly seized the consignment and took it to the Municipal Office. Thereafter, he purchased for a sum of four annas a sample of one of the tins for analysis and the analysis when made disclosed the fact that the ghee was grossly adulterated. Upon these facts, the petitioner was convicted as already stated and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 200. The question is whether he is liable for having committed an offence under S. 406. In our opinion, he is not, for the simple reason that none of the ingredients which constitute an offence under that section has been proved against him. It has been argued by Mr. Chuckerbutty who has appeared for the prosecution that the fact of the compulsory sale of the sample for analysis constituted a sale within the meaning of S. 406. That is an argument which we cannot for one moment accept. It is plain that, if it had not been for this compulsory sale, there would have been no sale whatever and it seems to us impossible to hold that a compulsory sale made under the provisions of S. 424 Cl. (1) can make any person amenable to the punishment provided for under S. 488 of the Act. We are, therefore, of opinion that this conviction cannot be maintained. The Rule is made absolute. The conviction and sentence are set aside and the fine, if paid, will be refunded.

Criminal Revision No. 1164 of 1927, Decided on 15th December 1927.

Penal Code, S. 409—Accused a lessee from Government to collect rent and deposit it in treasury—Failure to deposit within agreed time is not an offence under S. 409.

The petitioner had executed a kabuliyat in favour of the Government whereby he agreed to realize the grass rent of a Mouzah payable to the Government lying within his jurisdiction and to deposit the said amount in the Government Treasury on or before the date to be fixed by the Chief Commissioner or any other authorized officer from time to time, and if he failed to deposit the grass rent from his kist within the time fixed, the Government should be competent to realize from him or from his surety or sureties the said sum in arrears according to law prescribed for the realization of arrears of rent. The petitioner failed to deposit the rent as agreed to by him.

Held: that the penalty would be that the amount would be recovered from his sureties or himself; the kabuliyat did not contemplate his being criminally prosecuted for failure to deposit the amount realized. The position of the petitioner was not that of a servant but a lessee. [P 322 C 1]

Probodh Chandra Chatterji and Jnananath Borah—for Petitioner.

Judgment.—This rule has been granted on ground 3 of the petition which runs as follows:

For from the terms of the kabuliyat it would appear that no criminal offence could be said to have been committed by the accused even if he failed to credit the amount realized by him.

The fact would appear to be these: The petitioner had executed a kabuliyat in favour of the Government of Assam as a collector of grazing fees. He collected three sums Rs. 28, Rs. 24 and Rs. 24 which he did not remit to the Treasury. On this finding he has been convicted on three counts under S. 409. He argues now that even if he failed to pay in these amounts to the treasury he cannot be held criminally liable. All that the Government can do if he fails to pay into the treasury the amount he has realized is to proceed against him and his sureties by the procedure prescribed for the realization of arrears of rent. The relevant portions of the kabuliyat are as follows:

I shall realize the grass rent of the Mouzah payable to the Government lying within my jurisdiction and I shall deposit the said amount in the Government Treasury on or before the date to be fixed by the Chief Commissioner or any other authorized officer from time to time. If I fail to deposit the grass rent from my kist within one month time fixed the Government shall be competent to realize from me or from my surety or sureties the said sum in arrears according to law prescribed for the realization of arrears of rent.

Clause 2 merely provides the amount of the surety. Cl. 4 deals with his remuneration which is to be a commission or a fixed salary. Reading this kabuliyat it seems to me to be quite clear that the Moujadar was justified in thinking that if by any chance he failed to deposit the grass rent realized by him the penalty would be that the amount would be recovered from his sureties or himself by a certain procedure and that the kabuliyat did not contemplate his being criminally prosecuted for failure to deposit the amount realized. The position of the Moujadar seems to me to be really not that of a servant but a lessee.

In view of the terms of the kabuliyat it seems to me that it is not open to Government to prosecute the petitioner in the criminal Court for failing to deposit the money he has realized. They seem to limit their remedy to the method prescribed in Cl. 2.

The result is that the finding and sentence must be set aside and the accused acquitted. The same order will govern Revision Case 1165.

Appeal No. 101 of 1925, Decided on 16th June 1927, from appellate decree of Sub-Judge, Dinajpur, D/- 1st September 1924.

Bengal Tenancy Act—Notification No. 964, T. R., dated 5th November 1898 extending Bengal Tenancy Act to Western Duars—A darchukanidar can establish that he is an occupancy tenant.

The plaintiffs were the holders of a jote, a chukani tenancy held by one C under whom the defendants alleged they were darchukanidars. The chukani was sold for arrears of rent and was purchased by the plaintiffs who served a notice on the defendant under S. 167, Ben. Ten. Act for annulling the encumbrance and thereafter instituted a suit for khas possession. The defence was that the defendants had occupancy rights in the lands and so were protected from eviction.

Held: that though a darchukani tenancy created by a chukanidar who had no right to create the same would not be recognized by law and would not be binding on the jotedar, yet considering the true meaning and effect of Notification T. R. dated 5th November 1898, Cl. (4), by which the Bengal Tenancy Act was extended to the Western Duars from 1st January 1899, the defendant should have a chance of establishing that he was a tenant whose tenancy was fit to be recognized in law and that as such tenant he had acquired a right of occupancy which protects him from eviction.

Judgment—This appeal has arisen from a suit which was instituted for recovery of khas possession. The plaintiffs were the holders of a jote in the Western Duars, under which there was chukani tenancy held by one Chakli Bewa, under whom the defendants allege they were darchukanidars. The chukani was sold for arrears of rent and was purchased by the plaintiffs who served a notice on the defendant under S. 167, Ben. Ten. Act for annulling the encumbrance and thereafter commenced this action. The defence was that the defendants had occupancy rights in the lands and so were protected from eviction.

The suit has been decreed by both the Courts below. One of the defendants has appealed.

The appellant's contention, to put it quite shortly, is that the Courts below have misconceived the terms of the notification by which the Bengal Tenancy Act was extended to the Western Duars, and, upon an erroneous view thereof, have not tried to find out the incidents of the defendant's darchukani tenancy and have thus omitted to decide the real points that arise in the case.

One of the questions that were raised in the trial Court in defence to the suit was whether by reason of an order of the Deputy Commissioner, dated 23rd October 1922, the status of the defendants was raised to that of chukanidars. It was pleaded that by reason of the purchase of the chukani by the plaintiffs, the defendants had acquired this higher status. The contention is clearly unsupportable and it was overruled by the trial Court and has not been pressed since then.

The main question in the case is whether the defendants who are darchukanidars have acquired a right of occupancy. The trial Court held that under the terms of the lease granted to the plaintiffs the latter were not entitled to create any tenancy in the lands excepting chukani tenancies, that the defendant's alleged tenancy was created not by the plaintiffs or their predecessors but by the chukanidars, the predecessors of Chakli Bewa, that the darchukani tenancy of the defendants was not created with the consent of the plaintiffs or their predecessors and that a darchukanidar in Western Duars had no right whatsoever in the lands. The Subordinate Judge, on appeal, has endorsed more or less the same view. He has held that the jotedar in Western Duars is in no way bound to recognize darchukanidars, and that according to the settlement proceedings which were approved by the Government and according to the forms approved for granting leases to chukanidars the latter are expressly debarred from letting out in darchukani lands granted to them, and so the darchukanidar could not acquire a right of occupancy.

The Bengal Tenancy Act (8 of 1885) was extended to the Western Duars with effect from 1st January 1899, by notification No. 964 T. R., dated 5th November 1898, subject to the restrictions and modifications specified in four clauses, of which Cl. (iv), which only is relevant, ran in those words:

Where there is anything in the said Bengal Tenancy Act which is inconsistent with any rights or obligations of a jotedar, chukanidar, darchukanidar or other tenant of agricultural land as defined in settlement proceedings, heretofore approved by Government or with the terms of a lease heretofore granted by Government to jotedar, chukanidar, darchukanidar, adhiar or other tenants of agricultural land, such rights, obligations or terms shall be enforceable notwithstanding anything contained in the said Act.

The clause is not very happily worded, but its meaning is plain enough. The darchukanidars in the Western Duars prior to the introduction of the Bengal Tenancy Act had no recognized status: the creation of darchukani tenancies has been expressly forbidden in the lease granted by Government to the jotedars as well as in the form approved by Government to be used for granting leases to chukanidars, and their tenancies were altogether ignored in the settlement proceedings that were had at the instance of the Government. Prior to the introduction of the Bengal Tenancy Act in the Western Duars, the rights of the tenants were regulated almost entirely by the contracts under which they held and there could be no question of any right of occupancy accruing under any statute. The forms of leases used ever since 1888 appear to have forbidden the creation of any sub-lease by a sub-tenant under the jotedar. A darchukani tenancy created by a chukanidar who had no right to create the same would not be recognized by law and would not be binding on the jotedar. There may, however, be conceivable cases where the sub-lease in favour of a darchukanidar was a good and valid one, by reason of there having been no restriction in the powers of the chukanidar or jotedar as regards the creation of the darchukani tenancy, and to the case of such a darchukanidar the provisions of the Bengal Tenancy Act having applied from 1st January 1899, the rights and privileges of an occupancy raiyat may have accrued. In the case of such a darchukanidar, the question may arise whether, notwithstanding that he holds under a chukanidar, he is not a raiyat, rather than an under-raiyat, and being a raiyat whether he has not acquired a right of occupancy just as any other raiyat to whom the Bengal Tenancy Act applies. On this question, the way in which the jote has been recorded in the settlement proceedings that took place prior to the Notification of 1898 would be relevant. If his tenancy has been ignored in the settlement proceedings he will have to account for the omission or prove a valid tenancy subsequent to the said proceedings. If it has been recorded in some shape or other he will obviously be in a better position.

The Courts below appear to have gone mainly, if not entirely, upon the rights of darchukanidars in general as recognized or rather in the settlement proceedings. In so far as they have done so, they appear to have misconceived the true meaning and effect of Cl. (iv) of the Notification. For this, however, in all probability it was not the Courts but the appellant himself, who was to blame, and it is exceedingly likely that the superior ingenuity of his legal advisers in this Court has given his defence a shape in which it was not presented before. As far as can be gathered from the materials on the record the appellant seems to have heretofore contented himself with casting his lot in common with all darchukanidars in Western Duars and did not attempt to make out a special case for himself. It is also true that the chances of the appellant being successful in establishing a special case for himself are rather slender. But it is not possible to say that the case that is now put forward is one that is inconsistent with the averments in the written statement or one that may not be allowed to be established upon those averments.

We are accordingly of opinion that the appellant should have a chance of establishing that he is a tenant whose tenancy is fit to be recognized in law and that as such tenant he has acquired a right of occupancy which protects him from eviction. For this purpose the origin and incidents of the appellant's alleged tenancy will have to be enquired into. The onus of proving the necessary facts will be on the appellant. Both parties will be allowed to adduce such further evidence or place before the Court such further materials as they may desire to do on this question.

As it will be convenient to have the matter decided by the lower appellate Court having regard to the nature of the further evidence or materials, if any, that are likely to be forthcoming, we merely set aside the decision of that Court and send down the case to it for being dealt with as above. Costs of this appeal will follow the event of the decision by the lower appellate Court.

Criminal Revn. No. 1004 of 1927, Decided on 8th March 1928.

Opium Act, S. 9 (c) and (f)—Accused convicted for having possessed opium in excess of quantity shown in the stock register and hidden in the premises—Cakes of opium supplied by the treasury proved to be often of over weight—Excess not proved to be due to selling under weight—Conviction was set aside.

Accused was convicted for having possessed a quantity of opium in excess of the quantity shown in the stock register and hidden in the premises. It was found that cakes of opium supplied by the treasury were often over weight. The conviction of the accused was based on the fact that the excess was not reported to the authorities, nor shown in the stock register but was kept hidden.

Held: that no offence had been proved on the part of the accused in possessing the opium as he did. There is no rule enjoining a duty on a licensee to reweigh the quantity of opium supplied by the treasury and enter in the stock register the actual weight and not the weight which the treasury has declared. If he kept his accounts on the footing of the weight as given by the treasury, it could hardly be said that any rules were contravened.

Held: further that no assumption, that the accused came by the excess by selling short weight to customers could be made against him. [P 325 C 2].

Khundkar—for the Crown.

Judgment.—This rule has been issued to show cause why the conviction of and the sentence passed on the petitioner should not be set aside or such other or further orders should not be passed as to this Court may seem fit and proper on grounds Nos. 3, 4 and 5 of the petition.

The petitioner is a salesman in a licensed opium shop. On a surprise visit being paid to the shop by an Inspector of Excise two irregularities appear to have been noticed; 1st, that the petitioner had sold a short weight of opium to a customer, and 2nd, a quantity of opium 27 tolas 9 as in weight was found in excess of the quantity shown in the stock register, and it was found hidden in the premises. On these irregularities charges under Cls. (c) and (f), S. 9, Opium Act, were laid against the petitioner. The Sub-Divisional Magistrate convicted the petitioner under both the clauses. The owner of the shop was jointly tried with the petitioner and was acquitted; and with him we are no longer concerned. Against his conviction aforesaid the petitioner appealed to the Sessions Judge who set aside the conviction under S. 9, Cl. (f), Opium Act, holding that the evidence relating to the shortweight sale was not satisfactory. He, however, upheld the conviction under S. 9, Cl. (c), and reduced the sentence originally passed on the petitioner.

Grounds Nos. 3, 4 and 5 of the petition upon which the rule has been issued are that the petitioner was not in possession of the opium, that if he possessed it, it was possessed under a license and that the charge is defective.

It has been found by the learned Sessions Judge that cakes of opium supplied by the treasury are often overweight; and of six cakes taken at random none was underweight, but all were overweight, the excess averaging about $1\frac{1}{2}$ tolas in 80 (=1 sr.). On this finding it would be essential to superadd a further finding that it was not possible for the petitioner or his master to have acquired the 27 tolas 9 as by accumulation of the excess supplied by the treasury, before it can be said that this quantity which was found in the shop was not covered by the license. There is no such finding in the judgment of the Sessions Judge; and indeed on the materials adduced on behalf of the prosecution it is not possible to arrive at such a finding. The Sessions Judge has based the conviction on the fact that the excess was not reported to the authorities, nor shown in the stock register, but was kept hidden. The clause runs:

Any person who in contravention of this Act or of rules made and notified under S. 5 or S. 8 possesses opium &c.

None of the facts on which the learned Sessions Judge has relied can be found to contravene any of the provisions of the Act. The charge framed against the petitioner does not set out which rule or rules framed under S. 5 or S. 8, the petitioner has contravened by not reporting the excess to the authorities, or not showing it in the stock register or keeping it hidden. This should have been stated in the charge if it was intended to prosecute the petitioner for being in possession of the excess in breach of any such rules. It is obvious that before the petitioner can be convicted for being in possession in contravention of a rule, he should be told which rule he is alleged to have contravened. The question therefore arises whether a retrial should be ordered so that the petitioner may be retried on a charge properly framed. Now, I have been taken through the conditions of the license and the rules framed under the Act, but I am not satisfied that there has been a breach thereof on the part of the petitioner in possessing the opium as he did. I do not find any rule enjoining a duty on the petitioner to reweigh the quantity of opium supplied by the treasury and enter in the stock register the actual weight, and not the weight which the treasury has declared. If he keeps his accounts on the footing of the weight as given by the treasury, it can hardly be said that Rr. 30 and 31, are contravened. Failure to report the excess or keeping the opium hidden is perhaps even less thought of by the rules. It has also been urged that it is possible that the petitioner came by the excess by selling short weight to customers, but I do not see my way to make such an assumption against the petitioner, the more so as the positive case of short weight that was made against the petitioner has failed.

The result, in my opinion, is that the rule should be made absolute. The conviction of the petitioner is accordingly set aside. The fine if paid should be refunded.

Appeal No. 363 of 1926, Decided on 15th July 1927, from appellate order of Officiating Sub-Judge, Dacca, D/- 13th May 1926.

Civil P. C., S. 105 (2)—Appeal from decree on a preliminary issue—Case remanded for decision on merits—Decree passed on merits after remand—Order of remand is not appealable.

A suit was brought to recover damages upon the footing that the defendant had dispossessed the plaintiffs from the land of which the plaintiffs were entitled to possession. The trial Court held that the suit was not maintainable without the establishment of the plaintiffs' title to the property, and upon that preliminary issue passed a decree dismissing the suit on the 6th November 1925. The plaintiffs appealed, and by the order of 13th May 1926 the appellate Court reversed the decree of the trial Court and remitted the case to the trial Court to be reheard upon the merits. The case having been returned to the trial Court was re-heard on 7th August 1926 and was contested by the parties on the merits. On 13th August 1926 a decree was passed in favour of the plaintiffs. Thereafter, on 24th August 1926, the defendant preferred an appeal to the High Court from the order of remand which had been passed on 13th May 1926.

Held: that it was not open to the defendant in the circumstances to prefer an appeal against the order of remand, inasmuch as that he did not take any objection to the order of remand and he did not prefer an appeal against the final decree: 32 Cal. 1023; 12 C. Prakash Chandra Pakrasi—for Appellant.

Bhupendra Kishore Bose—for Respondents.

Page, J.—This is an appeal from an order of 13th May 1926 passed by the learned Officiating Subordinate Judge of Dacca, by which he remanded the case for re-hearing before the learned Munsif of Dacca. The suit was brought to recover damages upon the footing that the defendant had dispossessed the plaintiffs from the land of which the plaintiffs were entitled to possession. The trial Court held that the suit was not maintainable without the establishment of the plaintiffs' title to the property, and upon that preliminary issue passed a decree dismissing the suit on 6th November 1925. The plaintiffs appealed, and by the order under appeal of 13th May 1926 the learned Subordinate Judge reversed the decree of the trial Court, and remitted the case to the trial Court to be re-heard upon the merits. The case having been returned to the trial Court was re-heard on 7th August 1926. It appears that the defendant applied for an adjournment of the case, and that at the retrial the suit was contested by the parties on the merits.

On 13th August 1926 the learned Munsif passed a decree in favour of the plaintiffs. Thereafter, on 24th August 1926, the defendant preferred an appeal to this Court from the order of remand which had been passed on 13th May 1926.

A preliminary objection to the hearing of the appeal has been raised by the respondents which is to the following effect: The learned vakil for the respondents contends that, although the appeal to this Court which has been preferred from the order of remand is within the time limited for appealing from such an order, it is not open to the defendant in the circumstances that I have narrated to prefer an appeal against the order of remand. In my opinion the preliminary objection must prevail, for in this Court the point is concluded by authority against the appellant: see Madhu Sudan Sen v. Kamini Kanta Sen (1), Baikuntha Nath Dey v. Salimulla Bahadur (2), Janaki Nath Ray v. Promotha Nath Roy (3), Mackenzie v. Narsingh Sahai (4), Ugra Narayan Singh v. Basanta Narain Singh (5), Uman Kunwari v. Jarbandhan (6) and Lakshmi v. Maru Devi (7).

In all these cases except Baikuntha Nath Dey v. Nawab Salimulla Bahadur (2), the appeal against the preliminary decree or the interlocutory order was presented after the final decree had been passed, and the fact that a final decree had been passed having been brought to the notice of the appellate Court at the hearing of the appeal from the preliminary decree or interlocutory order, it was held that, the final decree having been passed, the appeal against the preliminary decree or interlocutory order could not be maintained: Per Chatterjea and Walmsley, JJ., in Ramnath Singh v. Basanta Narain Singh (5).

It was contended by the learned vakil for the appellant that the earlier cases were distinguishable because under the previous Code it was permissible to challenge the order of remand on appeal from the decree passed at the retrial, whereas under S. 105, sub-S. (2) of the Code of 1908 the only mode in which it is permissible to contest an order of remand is by a direct appeal against the order. It has been held, however, in Janaki Nath Ray's case (3) that the ratio decidendi of the earlier cases was not affected by the Code of 1908. I agree with the view which was expressed by Chitty and N. Chatterjea, JJ., in that case. Now, in Madhu Sudan Sen v. Kamini Kanta Sen (1) Maclean, C. J., observed that if a party desire to avail himself of the privilege conferred by S. 588 in relation to an order of remand he ought to do so before the final disposal of the suit. He cannot be permitted to wait until after the final disposal of the suit and then to appeal against the interlocutory order without appealing from the decree in the suit ;

a fortiori he ought to prosecute an appeal against the order of remand if he knows that it is the only way in which he can contest the order of remand, and that it will not be open to him thereafter to challenge its validity at the retrial. In my opinion, the real ground upon which the view taken by the Calcutta High Court is founded is that expressed by Stephen, J., in Baikuntha Nath Dey v. Nawab Salimulla Bahadur (2).

The basis of the decision in Madhu Sudan Sen v. Kamini Kanta Sen (1) may be regarded as being the consent of the appellant to the proceedings subsequent to remand, implied by his not appealing against the order of remand during those proceedings.

It was open to the defendant in the present case to appeal against the order of remand, or to accept the order of remand and to take his chance of proving successful at the retrial as he had been when the case had for the first time been heard. The defendant did not protest against the validity of the new trial, nor did he refuse to take any part in that proceeding. On the contrary, it appears that he contested the suit at the rehearing on the merits, that in the event a decree was passed against him, and that he has not preferred an appeal therefrom. I do not think that it was open to him, after having taken his chance of succeeding upon the merits at the retrial and when the day had gone against him, to give the go-by to the proceedings which terminated in a decree against him at the retrial, and thereafter to prefer an appeal against the interlocutory order of remand which was the foundation of the jurisdiction of the learned Munsif to rehear the case. A litigant finding himself in a situation such as that in which the appellant was placed must elect whether he will accept or repudiate the validity of the remand order. In my opinion, in the circumstances obtaining in the present case the appellant must be treated as having accepted the order of remand, and was not at liberty to prefer the present appeal.

The result is that the appeal is dismissed with costs.

Graham, J.—I agree. The question whether the appeal is competent or not appears prima facie to be concluded by the decision of this Court in the case of Madhu Sudan Sen v. Kamini Kanta Sen (1). That case was decided in the year 1905. But the learned vakil for the appellant has argued that S. 105, sub-S. (2), Civil P. C., which introduced a change in this section as it formerly stood (it was previously S. 591), has altered the position, and that, though the decision referred to above was good law under the Code as it then stood, it no longer represents sound law under the existing Code. The point emphasized is that under the former Code the order of remand could be challenged either by way of appeal against the remand, or by appealing against the decree, whereas now, under sub-S. (2) of this section, if the order of remand is not challenged in an appeal therefrom, the appellant is precluded from subsequently disputing its correctness. It is further contended that the appellant has in the circumstances which obtained in this case a dual and not an alternative remedy, and that it is open to him to exercise both these rights.

In my opinion, this contention is not well founded and cannot be allowed to prevail. It is true that a change has been made in S. 105, Civil P. C., but I do not think that the alteration has materially affected the merits of this question. The appellant having accepted the order of remand without exercising the right which he had of appealing against the same, and having submitted to the decision of the Court cannot, it seems to me, be allowed to turn round and say that, despite his failure in the suit, he is still entitled to challenge the order of remand. As regards sub-S. (2), S. 105, which has been relied upon by the learned vakil for the appellant, that sub-section, so far from helping the appellant seems rather to furnish an additional argument against him, since if it is not open to him under the present law to challenge the order of remand in an appeal against the decree unless he had appealed therefrom, it was all the more incumbent upon him to lose no time in challenging that order by appealing against it instead of remaining silent and allowing the suit to be tried out. Finally it may be observed that, so far as this Court is concerned, the matter is concluded by authority more recent than the year 1908, namely, the case of Janaki Nath Ray v. Promotha Nath Roy (3) and others decided in 1911.

For these reasons I agree with my learned brother that the preliminary objection succeeds and the appeal must be dismissed.

Sachindra Nath Roy and others—Respondents.

Appeals Nos. 447 and 474 of 1925, Decided on 30th November 1927, from original order of Sub-Judge, Murshidabad, D/- 17th August 1925.

(a) Civil P. C., O. 21, R. 66—Judgment-debtor's failure to put forward any objection even after receipt of notice debars him from raising it at any subsequent stage of proceeding.

If a judgment-debtor, after receipt of notice under O. 21, R. 66, or of the knowledge of the contents of the sale proclamation before it is issued, neglects to take any objection to the proceedings he should not in justice be allowed to take such objection at the sale or afterwards: 12 Mad. 19 (P.C.); 9 Cal. 656 (P.C.); 14 C.L.J. 541; 28 All. 273; 38 Mad. 387; and 3 I. A. 230, Rel. on. [P 331 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C., O. 21, R. 90—Mere undervaluation does not entitle a judgment-debtor to have the sale set aside unless he has sustained injury.

In order that the ground, that the properties were undervalued in the sale proclamation and therefore, the sale ought to be set aside, should succeed, it is not only necessary that the judgment-debtor should prove that the properties were undervalued in the sale proclamation but that by such undervaluation he has sustained injury. [P 331 C 1]

(c) Execution Sale—Setting aside—It is not wise and desirable to interfere with Court sales on slender grounds.

It is not wise and desirable to interfere with Court sales on grounds not strong enough. As a matter of ordinary experience, Court sales are not popular and if the impression is created in the minds of the public that such sales can be set aside on slight grounds it will take away a great deal from the security which an act of the Court ought to give to its proceedings, much to the prejudice of the judgment-debtors.

(d) Civil P. C., O. 21, R. 90—Decree-holder's willingness to return property to judgment-debtor for the price at which it was bought is a circumstance which may be taken into consideration whether judgment-debtor has suffered any injury at the sale.

The circumstance that the decree-holders offered to return the properties to the judgment debtor at the prices for which they bought them but the offer was not accepted, may be taken into consideration in judging whether the judgment-debtor has really suffered any injury by the sale: A. I. R. 1922 Cal. 589, Ref. [P 332 C 2, P 333 C 1]

Naresh Chandra Sen Gupta and Urukramdas—for Appellant.

Jogesh Chandra Roy, Anilendra Nath Roy Choudhuri and Basanta Kumar Mukherji—for Respondents.

Suhrawardy, J.—These two appeals arise out of two execution proceedings in execution of a decree obtained by the respondent opposite party against the appellant and another. The properties involved in these appeals were sold in execution of the decree and the judgment-debtor's objections under O. 21, R. 90, having failed he has preferred the present appeals. Four properties were put up for sale. Lot 1 was withdrawn as a formal defect was discovered in the sale proclamation in respect of that property. The sale of property No. 2 was set aside by consent. The sale of lots 3 and 4 has been confirmed by the Court below and Appeal No. 474 of 1925 refers to those lots. Lot 1 was subsequently sold and the sale having been confirmed by the Court below the judgment-debtor has preferred Appeal No. 447 of 1925 in respect of that lot. I will take up for consideration Appeal No. 474 in which most of the papers bearing on both the appeals have been printed. Lot 3 is a garden called Amarbagh. Lot 4 is a piece of land in the town of Berhampur with a small stable on it. In the sale proclamation lot 3 was valued at Rs. 200 and it was purchased by the decree-holder for Rs. 650. Lot 4 was valued at about Rs. 300 in the sale proclamation and was purchased by the decree-holder at the sale for Rs. 950. The appellant, in his application under O. 21, R. 90, raised two principal objections, namely, that the values of the properties mentioned in the sale proclamation were very low, the proper value of lot 3 being about Rs. 1,500 and of lot 4 Rs. 2500, and hence the properties were sold at a very low price; and secondly, that the sale processes were not properly published and were fraudulently suppressed. I will first examine the first ground of objection, namely, the undervaluation of the properties and the consequent sales thereof at inadequate prices. In order to fully realize the value of the objection it will be necessary to refer to certain proceedings in the execution case in the Court below.

The Privy Council decree was obtained in 1921 and the application for execution thereof was made on 28th April 1922. On 20th May 1922 writs of attachment were issued in respect of various properties situated in different districts. On 13th June 1922 the writs of attachment were returned served and by the order of that date notice under O. 21, R. 66, was ordered to be issued fixing 5th July 1922 for return. That notice appears to have been served on 20th June and on 5th July 1922 the judgment-debtor appeared on notice and prayed for time to file objections. The Court granted 10 days time to the judgment-debtor for filing objections and on the same date ordered the issue of sale proclamation under O. 21, R. 66 fixing 17th August for sale of the attached properties. On 15th July 1927 judgment debtor 1 (the appellant before us) filed a petition of objection under S. 47, Civil P. C. The only grounds of objection mentioned in that petition were that the decree-holders were not entitled to interest on the sum decreed and that they were not entitled to the costs of the first Court. There was also the general objection that the properties were not liable to be sold in execution of the decree and that the decree could not be executed against the judgment-debtor. These objections were disallowed by the execution Court on 2nd August 1922 except with reference to a certain matter with which we are not at present concerned. On that date namely, 2nd August 1922, the appellant's son filed a claim on the ground that he being a member of the Mitakshara family was interested in the properties ordered to be sold. That claim was rejected on that very date. Then, on the 8th August 1922, one Narpat Singha (brother of the judgment-debtor Maharaj Bahadur) applied for a declaration of his mortgage lien on lots 1 and 3 of the attached properties for a sum of a lac of rupees with interest. The Court directed the nazir to inform the fact of the claim to intending purchasers at the time of sale. Thereafter the appellant's son instituted a title suit and in that suit prayed for stay of the sale pending the decision of that suit, which was granted. There was an appeal to this Court from the order staying the sale, which was decreed and the order staying the sale was set aside. Thereafter on the application of the decree-holders for the issue of fresh sale proclamation it was issued fixing 15th September for the sale of the attached properties. On 15th September the appellant presented a petition in which he complained for the first time of the lowness of the prices mentioned in the sale proclamation and also objected to the sale on the ground of want of proper publication of the sale processes. All these objections were overruled except the objection with reference to lot 1 which was exempted from sale. The properties were sold on that date and purchased by the decree-holders as stated above.

On 6th October 1923 the appellant filed an application under O. 21, R. 90, praying for setting aside the sale on the ground of the value of the properties mentioned in the sale proclamation being low and of fraudulent suppression of the sale proclamation. This application was rejected by the executing Court on 6th June 1925 and hence this appeal. I have given a detailed account of the proceedings taken in the Court below 'in connexion with the execution to show that the appellant must have been aware of the contents of the sale proclamation and the date on which it was first issued, namely in July 1922. It is also difficult to believe that he was unaware of the issue of the sale proclamation and of its publication when his son and brothers were objecting to the properties being sold on various grounds which showed an intention on the part of the judgment-debtor to present all obstructions to the sale of the properties. It was on the date of sale, namely, 15th September 1923 that he for the first time raised the objection that the properties were undervalued in the sale proclamation. Under O. 21, R. 66 the Court is required to give notice to the decree-holder and the judgment-debtor for the purpose of settling the contents of the sale proclamation including the approximate price of the properties asked to be sold. After settling these points the Court is required to issue sale proclamation for publication. If any party omits on notice under O. 21, R. 66, to put forward any objection it seems just and equitable that it should not be allowed to be raised at a subsequent stage of the proceeding and specially just on the day when the sale was going to be held. In the case of Giridhari Singh v. Hardeo Narain Singh (1), there was a material error in the sale proclamation, namely, the Government revenue in respect of the property directed to be sold was mentioned much less than it actually was. The judgment-debtor appeared and applied for postponement of the sale and agreed to the attachment and notification of the sale being maintained. Subsequent to the sale the judgment-debtor applied for the setting aside of the sale on the ground that the Government revenue was wrongly mentioned in the sale proclamation and of the consequent inadequacy of the price. Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee held that the irregularities complained of were sufficient to set aside the sale; but since in the application for postponement the judgment-debtor omitted to raise this objection and practically admitted that the notification was correct they refused to set aside the sale. The strongest case upon this point is the case of Arunachellum v. Arunachellam Chetti (2). In that case the judgment-debtors had an opportunity of objecting to the sale, but they lay by and after the sale, but before it was completed, they presented a petition for setting aside the sale on the ground that the sale of the whole property was bad and that only a portion of it should have been sold. Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee, in holding that the judgment-debtors should not be allowed to raise the objection at that stage, made the following observation:

It would be very difficult indeed to conduct proceedings in execution of decrees by attachment and sale of property if the judgment-debtor could lie by and afterwards take advantage of any misdescription of the property attached and about to be sold which he knew well but of which the execution creditor or the decree-holder might be perfectly ignorant, that he should take no notice of that, allow the sale to proceed and then come forward and say the whole proceedings were vitiated. That in their Lordships' opinion cannot be allowed.

Their Lordships also referred to the case of Olpherto v. Mahabir Pershad (3), where it was laid down that if there was really a ground of complaint and if the judgment-debtors would have been injured by proceedings in attaching and selling the whole of the property whilst the interest was such as it was, they ought to have come and complained. This view has been in several cases expressed of which it is enough to refer to the case of Pran Singh v. Janardan Singh (4), where Mookerjee, J. made the following observation:

No doubt, if the judgment-debtor after notice of the proceedings does not object in the sale proclamation at that stage (when the sale proclamation is settled), a subsequent objection by him on the ground of inaccuracy or insufficiency of description is not likely to be entertained by the Court.

A similar view was taken in the cases of Behari Singh v. Mukut Singh (5), Raja of Kalahasti v. Maharaja of Venkatagiri (6). In the present case on the facts and circumstances of it I have no doubt left in my mind that the judgment-debtor was aware from July 1922 of the contents of the sale proclamation and the prices of the properties mentioned therein. He had ample opportunities to take objection on the ground of misstatement of value in the sale proclamation but he lay by and allowed the sale proceedings to proceed until the date of sale. The learned advocate appearing for the appellant distinguishes the cases referred to above on the ground that in the above cases the judgment-debtor was held not entitled to object to the sale after the sale whereas in the present case the appellant objected to the sale on the ground of wrong mention of the value in the sale proclamation before the sale. On principle I do not see any difference between the two cases. The objection in the present case as regards undervaluation of the properties in the sale.

proclamation was first made on the date of the sale and immediately before the sale. If the judgment-debtor is allowed to object on such a ground at any stage of the execution proceedings before the sale there can never be any finality of those proceedings. In my judgment if a judgment-debtor after receipt of notice under O. 21, R. 66 or of the knowledge of the contents of the sale proclamation before it is issued neglects to take any objection to the proceedings he should not in justice be allowed to take such objections at the sale or afterwards. I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment-debtor ought not to be allowed to object to the sale on the ground that the properties were undervalued in the sale proclamation.

Though in the above view it is not necessary to consider the other objections raised on behalf of the judgment-debtor but as the points were fully argued before us it is better that we should express an opinion on the other grounds. It is urged that the properties were undervalued in the sale proclamation and therefore the sale ought to be set aside. In order that this ground should succeed it is not only necessary that the judgment-debtor should prove that the properties were undervalued in the sale proclamation but that by such undervaluation he has sustained injury, namely, that the properties were sold at inadequate prices. In other words, the undervaluation of the properties in the sale proclamation is a material irregularity and such irregularity caused injury to the judgment-debtor. Now lot No. 3 is said to be worth Rs. 1500. It is said to be a mango orchard; but from the appellant's evidence it appears that it cannot be a very valuable property. The sumarnabis and tehsildar (accountant and collector) of the appellant admits in his evidence that there is no house within it and no gardener has been attached to it within the last 30 years. There is a tank in it which has no banks and, there are some fruit trees in the garden the fruits of which were sold by the appellant once or twice within the last few years. I may mention here as I shall have occasion to remark hereafter that the appellant did not put himself into the witness-box and did not produce any papers to show the profits be made out of this property. Taking these facts into consideration it is difficult to hold that the value of the property given in the sale proclamation is grossly inadequate. Reference has been made in this connexion to the leading case on this point viz., the case of Saadatmund Khan v. Phul Kuar (7). The facts of that case were that the property therein was worth Rs. 10,000 but in the sale proclamation the value was mentioned to be Rs. 800 and it was advertised for sale for realizing a debt of Rs. 500 only. Their Lordships said with reference to the facts of that case that it was indeed something more than the kind of irregularity which was commonly alleged for it was a misstatement of the value of the property which was so glaring in amount that it could hardly have been made in good faith, and which, however, it came to be made, was calculated to mislead possible bidders. A similar observation was made by their Lordships in the case of Tekait Krishna Prasad Singh v. Moti Chand (8), where a property of which the annual income was about Rs. 5,000 was valued in the sale proclamation at Rs. 2000. Their Lordships observed on the evidence that it was a gross undervaluation and that their Lordships had no doubt that the decree-holder had procured the insertion of this valuation for the purpose of making possible a purchase by him at that low figure.

Now in the present case can it be said that the misstatement of the value of the property was so glaring in amount that it could hardly have been made in good faith (Saadatmund Khan's case), or it was a gross undervaluation inserted by the decree-holder for the purpose of making possible a purchase by him at a low figure (Tekait Krishna's case)? The difference between the value mentioned by the judgment-debtor and that mentioned in the sale proclamation is not so great as to be either a 'glaring undervaluation' or a 'gross misstatement'. In this connexion I may mention, and I will refer to this fact again, that before the lower Court the decree-holder offered to return these properties at the prices at which he had purchased them but the offer was not accepted. A similar offer was made before us and it was not availed of.

Now as to the value of lot No. 3, there is only oral evidence and it is very easy for a witness to come and say that the value of the property was so much. The appellant has kept back best evidence on this point. If he had offered himself for examination the real state of the property and the value which he had paid for it and other matters could have been brought out. He further kept back his papers which would have shown what profits he made out of this property. In the absence of this evidence I am unable to accept the oral evidence of the witnesses who come and glibly say that the property is worth from Rs. 1,500 to Rs. 2,000. The learned advocate for the appellant has laid great stress upon the fact that the property which was valued in the sale proclamation at Rs. 200 was purchased by the decree-holder at Rs. 650 and, according to the learned advocate, that was a clear evidence of undervaluation in the sale proclamation. It is difficult to make the deduction from this circumstance alone which the learned advocate draws from it. At the time of the sale the decree-holder might have thought that the property was worth the amount for which he purchased. But admitting that the price paid by the decree-holder was about three times the amount mentioned in the sale proclamation, the undervaluation was not so gross as to amount to irregularity.

Then admitting that it was a material irregularity, the appellant to my mind has failed to prove that he suffered any injury from the undervaluation of the property. When we take into account the condition of this property as disclosed in the evidence of the judgment-debtor himself and the fact that at the time of the sale a claim of the appellant's brother to the extent of a lac of rupees with interest was published at the time of the sale, the value fetched at the sale cannot be said to be in any way inadequate.

We, now come to lot No. 4. With regard to this property the evidence is that it has an area of 3 cattas and that there is a structure there which is called a stable with two rooms—one about 4 cubits wide and another a cubit and a half, in not a very habitable condition. The judgment-debtor had examined some witnesses and produced some documents to prove the value of certain properties in the locality. Exhibit I shows that 1 catta and 12 chittaks of homestead land with a brick built house standing thereon was sold for Rs. 1,025 in 1889. Ex-D is another sale-deed which shows that 1½ cattas of jamai land was sold for Rs. 500. This is all the tangible evidence we have got; but, it is difficult to say on the materials on the record that the value of lot 4 is much more than what it fetched at the sale. There is no evidence that anyone was willing to purchase this property for more than what it was sold for at the sale; and there is the further fact, to which I have already referred, namely, that the respondents are still willing to return this property if the price for which they have purchased it is paid back to them.

In this connexion I should like to observe that it is not wise and desirable to interfere with Court sales on grounds not strong enough. As a matter of ordinary experience we know that Court sales are not popular, and if the impression is created in the minds of the public that such sales can be set aside on slight grounds it will take away a great deal from the security which an act of the Court ought to give to its proceedings, much to the prejudice of judgment-debtors.

All the considerations to which I have referred with reference to lot 3 apply to this lot also and it is not necessary to refer to them. I am accordingly of opinion that it cannot be said definitely on the evidence on the record and in view of the circumstances of this case that this lot 4 was sold at a much lower price and thereby the judgment-debtor has suffered loss. Three facts, to which I have already referred, stand out very prominent when one tries to discover if the appellant has any real grievance in the matter. One is that the evidence is so vague that it is very difficult for one to act upon it. There is no evidence that there was any person willing to purchase the properties and for higher prices. The second fact to which I have referred is that the decree-holders offered to return the properties to the judgment-debtor at the prices for which they bought them. We have authority that this circumstance may be taken in to consideration in judging whether the judgment-debtor has really suffered any injury by the sale. Bejoy Singh Dudhuria v. Asutosh Goswami (9). The third circumstance which seems to be the most important is the absence of the appellant from the witness-box and holding back the best evidence. Take, for instance, the service of the notice under O. 21, R. 66, for the purpose of settling the sale proclamation, we have the evidence of the peon. He says that he went to the house of the judgment-debtor and found his darwan, Hulas Singh, at the gate and he was told that the judgment-debtor was upstairs. He wanted to serve the notice on the judgment-debtor but he was prevented by the darwan from entering the house. He sent information to the appellant through Hulas Singh and he was told that the appellant had asked him to hang up the notice on the outer door. Along with this notice on the appellant the peon also served a notice on another judgment-debtor, Surja Kumar Adhikari, said to be the manager of the judgment-debtor. The peon says that he found Surja Kumar in the appellant's house; but he having refused to take the notice on being informed of its contents he served it by hanging it over the gate of the appellant's house. It is strange that neither the judgment-debtor nor his darwan Hulas Singh nor his manager Surja Kumar Adhikari has come to the witness-box and denied the service of notice. It cannot, therefore, be doubted that the notice was properly served upon the appellant.

In the view I take of the questions I have discussed above it is not necessary to enter into the evidence relating to the publication of the sale proclamation. I must admit that the evidence is not very satisfactory on behalf of the decree-holders. But considering that that evidence was given some time after the publication and also the fact that the respondents had to examine a number of officers of Court of different places, the evidence may be accepted as satisfactory against the evidence of the appellant which is almost nil. The evidence adduced by the appellant must, in the circumstances, be negative; but it is the evidence of persons for whom it was so very easy to deny facts. For instance, there is the tailor Belait Khalifa who, according to the serving peon was present at the time of the service of the sale proclamation. But he comes on behalf of the appellant and denies such service. If there was no service or there was fraudulent suppression of sale proclamation the respondent's first witness would not have mentioned the name of this witness as being present on the occasion. The Court below was impressed with the demeanour of respondents' witnesses and some of them appear to be more respectable. There is an ugly fact which does not speak well for the respondents. At the time of the sale the bid sheet shows that there were present only the respondents' pleader and a person who was the tadbirkar of the respondents. It was foolish on the part of the decree-holders to have made a show of bid at the sale, but that is what they did. We may take it that there was no bidder at the sale except the decree-holders. But, I as have said, there was no material irregularity or consequent injury to the appellant; the insufficiency of the evidence with regard to the publication of the sale on behalf of the decree-holders does not very much affect the case. To sum up my conclusion: I find against the judgment-debtor because I hold that notice under O. 21, R. 66 was served upon him and he neglected, if he had any real grievance, to take any objection as to undervaluation in time. He has further failed to prove that the properties were sold, considering that the sale was a Court sale with the right of future litigation, at inadequate prices. He has also failed to prove that he suffered any real injury on account of the properties being sold at inadequate prices. When we take into consideration the fact that a title suit with regard to this property by his son is still pending and that the claim of his brother to the extent of a lac of rupees is still hanging over them. I am not satisfied further with the bonafides of the judgment-debtor in this case. In my judgment this appeal (474 of 1925) ought to fail and should be dismissed with costs 5 gold mohurs.

As regards Appeal No. 447 of 1925: all that I have said with reference to service of notice under O. 21, R. 66 applies to this case. I hold that notice was served upon the appellant and he failed to take objection on the ground of undervaluation in time. He, therefore, should not be allowed to take this objection at this stage. Apart from that circumstance the facts of this case are different from the other case and are such as not to entitle the appellant to any relief. The appellants pleader in the lower Court conceded that the appellant was unable to prove any material irregularity in the conduct of the sale. This admission may or may not be binding upon the appellant, but it is quite justified in the circumstances of the case. Lot 1, which is the subject-matter of the appeal, is a patni taluk with a rent of Rs. 1705 a year. It was purchased by the respondent at Rupees 25,000, being 15 times the annual profit. I should say that in a Court sale the price fetched was quite adequate, when we take into consideration the fact as appears from the bid sheet in this case that the nazir proclaimed at the time that there was a claim for a lac of rupees with interest of the appellant's brother over this property. I need not in detail examine the evidence of publication in this case as I find that the appellant sustained no injury by the sale. The evidence moreover is not such as to induce me to hold that the sale proclamation was not properly published. In fact the evidence adduced by the respondents is much stronger. All the other circumstances which have induced me to hold against the appellant in the other appeal apply with equal force in this case. I accordingly dismiss this appeal with costs 5 gold mohurs.

Appeal No. 1854 of 1925, Decided on 5th January 1928, from appellate decree of 1st Sub-Judge, Pabna, D/- 21st April 1925.

(a) Legal Practitioner—Compromise empowered by vakalatnama—It is uncommon for pleaders to enter on this authority into compromise, especially in cases where pardanashin ladies are concerned.

Though a clause authorizing a pleader to compromise is to be found in vakalatnamas that are ordinarily filed, it is exceedingly uncommon for pleaders to take the responsibility of entering into a compromise on the strength of the authority conferred by it, the more so in cases where illiterate pardanashin ladies are concerned. Those who assert that this was the position have got to discharge an exceedingly heavy burden indeed and the least that could be expected of them is that they should examine the pleader himself. [P.335 C 2]

(b) Evidence Act, S. 115—Compromise beneficial to a party's interest—Party not taking advantage—Compromise does not constitute estoppel.

Even if the compromise is beneficial to a party's interest, but he has not taken any benefit out of or under it, that compromise does not constitute an estoppel debarring him from challenging it. [P 336 C 1]

Judgment.—The suit in which this appeal has arisen was one for setting aside a compromise decree. The suit in which that decree was passed was title Suit 704 of 1922 in which defendant 1 of this suit was the plaintiff, defendant 2, who is the plaintiff's husband, was originally the sole defendant, and the plaintiff was added as defendant 2 therein on the objection of her husband that she was the owner of some of the properties involved.

The Court of first instance dismissed the suit. The lower appellate Court has reversed that decision. Hence the appeal by defendant 1.

The plaintiff challenged the validity of the compromise alleging that she is an illiterate pardanashin lady, that she sent a vakalatnama through her husband to be filed in the suit, but gave no authority to anybody, either verbally or in writing, that she was all along under the impression that the suit was pending and that she did not know anything about the compromise and so the same was not binding on her. The defence was, amongst others, that the plaintiff had duly executed the vakalatnama that was filed, that her husband was looking after the suit and had authority to settle the terms of the compromise and to give instructions to the pleader who had appeared on her behalf, that she was perfectly aware of the compromise all through and that she was benefited by the compromise and had also approved of it. The issues framed in the suit, however, betray a lamentable lack of care on the part of those responsible for the framing thereof, and the Court evidently did not consider the pleadings at the time when they were framed.

The pleadings give rise to a number of questions which must be answered one way or the other before the suit can be properly disposed of. They are: First: Was the pleader who filed the compromise petition authorized to compromise the suit and did he agree to the compromise acting under such authority? Second: Was the plaintiff's husband authorized to compromise the suit on her behalf and did he act in the matter of the compromise on the strength of such authority? Third: Was the compromise entered into by the plaintiff herself or with her knowledge and consent or approval? These three questions have got to be kept separately in view, and if any of them is answered in the affirmative the plaintiff's suit must fail.

The main arguments that have been addressed in support of this appeal have sought to elicit an answer in the affirmative in respect of each of the aforesaid three questions, while the respondent has endeavoured to support the findings of the Subordinate Judge and has urged that those findings are sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to the decree she has obtained.

Now as regards the first of these questions the Subordinate Judge appears to have fallen into an error in supposing that the vakalatnama (Ex. A) does not authorize the pleader to compromise the suit but only empowers him to ask for permission to compromise. This view is based upon a misreading of the terms of the vakalatnama. The difficulty, however, in the appellant's way is that there is nothing to show that the pleader purported to compromise the suit on his own responsibility and acting on the authority conferred on him by the vakalatnama. The pleader has not been examined as a witness in the case. The appellant says that as the plaintiff in her plaint denied having given any authority, verbal or written, to anybody to compromise the suit though she admitted having sent a vakalatnama through her husband, as soon as he has succeeded in showing that the vakalatnama contains the necessary authority, his burden is discharged, and it is for the plaintiff to prove that the pleader did not act on that authority. This position, no doubt, is correct; but then it has not been proved that the plaintiff was aware of this clause in the vakalatnama when she executed it—a matter with regard to which the burden of proof was on the appellant and which he has not discharged. The finding of the trial Court upon which the appellant relies, so far as this matter is concerned and which is to the effect that Ex. A was the vakalatnama which the plaintiff had executed, does not go near enough to what the appellant has got to establish to fix the plaintiff with knowledge of this particular clause. Moreover though a clause of this description is to be found in vakalatnamas that are ordinarily filed, it is exceedingly uncommon for pleaders to take the responsibility of entering into a compromise on the strength of the authority conferred by it, the more so in cases where illiterate pardanashin ladies are concerned. Those who assert that this was the position have got to discharge an exceedingly heavy burden indeed and the least that could be expected of them is that they should the examine pleader himself.

As regards the second question the Subordinate Judge has found that it does not appear that the plaintiff, to quote his words, either expressly or impliedly clothed her husband with plenary authority to compromise the suit on her behalf.

The arguments that have been advanced on behalf of the appellant did not seriously challenge the correctness of this finding.

So far as the third question is concerned it is sufficient to state that the finding of fact at which the Subordinate Judge has arrived is that the compromise was made without the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff.

A further contention was advanced, though rather faintly, which was to the effect that the plaintiff was benefited by the compromise, and in support of this contention reliance was placed on a finding of the Munsif which does not appear to have been touched by the Subordinate Judge. The Munsif says:

Defence witness 1 explains how she (i.e., the plaintiff) has enjoyed the benefit of the compromise. In my opinion the explanation is very satisfactory. Moreover the Court would not have sanctioned the compromise after two days' contest if the compromise had not benefitted the present plaintiff who was a pardana-shin lady; it had a sacred duty to perform.

I am inclined to think that what the learned Munsif meant to say was merely that the compromise was beneficial to the plaintiff—a matter which is neither here nor there in the present suit. Even if the compromise was beneficial to her interest, so long as she has not taken some benefit out of or under it which would constitute an estoppel debarring her from remedy, it does not matter in the least. Of this estoppel there is nothing on which it may be founded.

The appeal, in my judgment fails and it is accordingly dismissed with costs.

Ananta Dhar and another—Accused—Opposite Party.

Criminal Revn No. 87 of 1928, Decided on 27th March 1928, from acquittal order of Municipal Magistrate, Calcutta.

Calcutta Municipal Act (1925), S. 488 (2), Sch. 17, R. 7—Re-thatching of roof with leaves and allowing it to remain in contravention of the requirements of R. 7 is not a continuing offence.

Where the owner of a hut put new golpatta leaves upon the old framework of the roof of his hut and the charge against him on that occasion was that he had entirely re-thatched the roof of the hut with new golpatta, and thereafter another prosecution was instituted and it was contended on behalf of the Corporation that because the accused had not pulled down the golpatta roof or altered it in accordance with the requirements of R. 7, Sch. 17, he was guilty of a continuing offence.

Held: that he was not guilty of continuation of the offence within S. 488 (2), as allowing the roof to remain is not a continuation of the offence of making the roof: Marshall v. Smith 8 C. P. 416, Cons. [P 337 C 1]

B. L. Mitter, Sures Chandra Taluqdar, Mohendra Kumar Ghose and Gopendra Krishna Banerji—for Petitioner.

Prabodh Chandra Chatterji—for Opposite Party.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case a rule was issued at the instance of the Corporation of Calcutta requiring the opposite party to show cause why a certain order of acquittal passed by the Municipal Magistrate in favour of the opposite party should not be set aside on the ground that the Magistrate had misconceived the law and acquitted the accused on an erroneous hypothesis and assumption.

It appears that the opposite party is the owner of a hut consisting of certain premises in Calcutta and that after the commencement of the Calcutta Municipal Act of 1925 he put new golpatta leaves upon the old framework of the roof of his hut. He was accordingly prosecuted under R. 7, Sch. 17, Municipal Act, the Clause 1, whereof says that external roof of walls of buildings shall not, after the commencement of this Act, be made of grass, leaves, mats, canvas or other inflammable materials.

It appears that the charge against him on that occasion was that he had entirely re-thatched the roof of the hut with new golpatta. Thereafter the prosecution with which we are now concerned was instituted and it was contended on behalf of the Corporation that because the opposite party had not pulled down the golpatta roof or altered it in accordance with the requirements of R. 7, Sch. 17, he was guilty of a continuing offence within the meaning of the Calcutta Municipal Act and was liable to a daily fine of Rs 5. The Magistrate has held that the fact that the opposite party has not pulled down the golpatta leaves is not in continuation of the offence previously committed by him under R. 7 above mentioned.

The relevant section for the present purpose is first of all S. 488, Calcutta Municipal Act. It prescribes that certain penalties mentioned in the third column of a schedule thereto shall be incurred by persons who contravene any provision of the sections or rules of the Act mentioned in that schedule and also by any person who fails to comply with any lawful direction under any of the sections mentioned. Thereafter it prescribes by the second clause:

whoever, after having been convicted of any offence referred to in Cls. (a), (b), or (c), sub-S. (1) continues to commit such offence shall be punished for each day after the first during which he continues so to offend, with fine which may extend to the amount mentioned in this behalf in the fourth column of the said table.

The question is, therefore, whether or not this case comes within the terms of Cl. (2), S. 488, i. e., whether the opposite party continued to commit the offence of which he was previously convicted under R. 7, Sch. 17. This matter must be considered upon the basis of R. 7 which I have mentioned and the language of Cl. (2), S. 488. In view of the explanation attached to Cl. (2), S. 488, it appears to me to be erroneous to put any stress upon the particular words in the second column of the table which is governed by S. 488. I, therefore, pass over the phrase "construction of external roofs or walls of buildings with inflammable materials" which is to be found in that table and go to the fountain head, that is to say, the term of R. 7 itself. It is to be observed that that section is not expressed to say that in the case of external roofs or walls of buildings erected after the commencement of this Act the same shall not consist or be suffered to consist of inflammable materials. It says that external roofs shall not, after the commencement of this Act, be made of inflammable materials; and the offence which was committed by the opposite party for which he was rightly convicted was the offence of making the roof with an inflammable material. The leading case on this subject is the case of Marsshall v. Smith (1) and in that case, which has never been dissented from in England, it was held under a very similar clause that the offence consisted in the building of the wall. It was also held that a mere failure to pull down a wall or rebuild it in accordance with the statutory requirements was not a continuation of that offence. In consequence of that decision S. 158, Public Health Act, 1875, was made to provide that where the beginning or the execution of the work is an offence in respect whereof the offender is liable in respect of any byelaw to a penalty the existence of the work during its continuance in such a form and state as to be in contravention of the byelaw shall be deemed to be a continuing offence.

No such provision has been incorporated into the Calcutta Municipal Act and if, therefore, we are to hold that the conduct of the opposite party in suffering the roof to remain is a continuation of the offence of making the roof, we have to do a certain amount of violence to the language of Cl. (2), S. 488. It is plain as a matter of right reason that suffering the roof to remain is not a continuation of the offence committed, i. e., of making the roof. When one looks at the scheme and the language of the table which follows S. 488 one notices that the daily fine is one of Rs. 5, and no doubt it does occur to one that while a person may after conviction continue to erect a roof of inflammable materials a daily fine of Rs. 5 does not seem to be a very adequate or convenient method of coping with that particular form of persistency in illegal conduct. At the same time it is possible to have a case where a person continues to erect or make a roof with inflammable materials after conviction and it cannot, therefore, be said that the Court is obliged by the frame of the table to extend the proper and ordinary meaning of the words "continues to commit such offence" found in Cl. (2), S. 488. I quite appreciate that it is a serious matter for the Corporation to be told that they have not the power to obtain a conviction in a case of this sort under Cl. (2), S. 488. Also I am the last person to be unduly influenced by any archaic notions as to a strict construction to be applied to a statute which deals with many very complicated matters. Speaking for myself, if I am satisfied that the meaning of what the legislature has said is to make this kind of conduct a continuation of the offence under R. 7 mere correctness of language would not deter me from giving effect to the intention of the legislature.

In the present case, however, I am not of opinion that there is sufficient in the language employed by the legislature to justify the Court in regarding this kind of conduct as a continuation of the offence within the meaning of Cl. (2), S. 488. It seems to me that if the Corporation has not sufficient power, where any works are erected contrary to the Act, to order them to be removed and in default of compliance to remove them itself at the expense of the owner, the sooner it takes power to act in that way the sooner it will be equipped with what is necessary to protect the city from conflagration. Again, if it is thought useful to have the power of a daily fine in such a case the sooner the Corporation goes to the legislature for a clause on the lines of S. 158, Public Health Act, 1875 the better. It is not only difficult but it is in some respects objectionable that a matter of this sort should be dealt with by a Court of law straining the plain words "continues to commit such offence" so as to supply the Corporation with a somewhat drastic power. In my judgment, the result of a consideration of the Calcutta Municipal Act is that I am satisfied that the view taken by the Magistrate is not only consistent with authority but is correct, and I think that this rule ought to be discharged.

Fazlur Rahman—Plaintiff—Appellant.
v.

Sardar Ali and others—Defendants—Respondents.

Appeal No. 2107 of 1924, Decided on 6th January 1927, from appellate decree of 2nd Sub-Judge, Chittagong, D/- 28th June 1924.

(a) Civil P. C., Ss. 65 and 66—Purchase at auction sale—Sale not confirmed—New code coming into operation in the meantime—The title of the purchaser does not become absolute and no suit under S. 66 can be maintained.

An auction sale, at which a benamidar purchased for the plaintiff, took place on 8th August 1908 when the Code of 1882 was in force. Under S. 316 of that Code the property purchased in execution of the decree vested in the purchaser on the confirmation of the sale; but the sale was not confirmed until 6th January 1909 when the Code of 1882 had ceased to operate and had been superseded by the Code of 1908. In a subsequent suit against transferees from the benamidar it was argued that, under S. 65 of the new Code, on the confirmation of the sale the title to the property is to vest back with retrospective effect from the date of the sale and by the confirmation of the sale under S. 65 of the new Code the plaintiff's title to the property accrued on 8th August 1908 and, therefore, S. 66 of the Code had no application but S. 317 of the old Code would apply.

Held: that as on 1st January this sale had not become absolute, the plaintiff's right had not accrued and as the plaintiff's right did not accrue on 1st January he was clearly bound by S. 66 of the new Code and if he was bound by S. 66 the plaintiff cannot maintain the suit: 47 Cal. 1108 and A. I. R. 1923 Cal. 85, Dist. [P 339 C 1]

Narendra Kumar Das—for Appellant.

Chandra Sekhar Sen—for Respondents.

Duval, J.—In this case the plaintiff sued for declaration of his title to and for possession of, certain land. His case was that he purchased it in auction sale in the benami of defendant 6 on 8th August 1908 and that subsequently he got possession in the name of his benamidar who was in possession for some time, but that in 1915 his benamidar sold the land to defendants 1 and 2 and he was dispossessed. He brought a case under S. 9, Specific Relief Act, and lost it and so he brought this suit. The defence set up in the written statement of the vendees was that the plaintiff was never in possession and that defendant 6 was not a benamidar and that the suit is barred under 66, Civil P. C. Defendant 6, who purported to sell the property has put in a written statement stating that he was a benamidar. After issues were framed the first Court tried the issue as to whether the suit lay in view of the provisions of S. 66, Civil P. C., and held that it did not. This finding has been upheld in appeal. The second appeal is directed on this point only.

Now the sale took place, as we have stated, on 8th August 1908. At that time the Code of 1882 was in force and under S. 316 of that Code the property purchased in execution of the decree vested on the confirmation of the sale; but the sale was not confirmed until 6th January 1909 when the Code of 1882 had ceased to operate and had been superseded by the Code of 1908. Under S. 65 of the present Code, on the confirmation of the sale, the title to the property is to vest back with retrospective effect from the date of the sale. The argument, therefore, addressed to us is that by the confirmation of the sale under S. 65 of the new Code the plaintiff's title to the property accrued on the 8th August 1908 and, therefore, S. 66 of the Code has no application but that S. 317 of the old Code applies. The chief difference between the two sections is that whereas under the old Code a suit would lie against the heirs or assignees of a benamidar though not against the benamidar under S. 66 of the new Code, no suit would lie against any one claiming a title under the certificated purchaser. The learned vakil for the appellant has referred to two decisions of this Court, being the case of Promotho Nath Pal v. Mohini Mohan Pal (1) and the case of Makarali v.

(1) [1920] 47 Cal. 1108=31 C. L. J. 463=58 I. O. 327=24 C. W. N. 1011.

Sarfaddin (2) to support his argument. But in both those cases the sale was confirmed before the new Code came into force; that is to say, before 1st January 1909, though in one of them the sale certificate did not issue until after the new Code came into force and there it was held that the real purchaser could maintain a suit against the transferee as his right had already accrued under the old Code. The present Code, however, is clearly different. No doubt S. 65 of the new Code states that when the sale has become absolute the property shall be deemed to have vested in the purchaser from the time when the property is sold and not from the time when the sale becomes absolute. But the question really before us is whether on 1st January 1909, when the new Code came into force, the plaintiff's right had accrued as a purchaser through the benami of defendant 1. In my opinion it had not. In this connexion reference must be made to S. 6, General Clauses Act, which says that when an Act repeals any enactment hitherto made or hereafter to be made, then, unless a different intention appears the repeal shall not affect any right acquired or accrued under any enactment so repealed.

The only point, therefore, is whether as a matter of fact on 1st January the plaintiff's right had accrued. Now, even if we take S. 65 as dating back the right, it is clear that on 1st January this sale had not become absolute and so the plaintiff's right had not accrued. Now, if the plaintiff's right did not accrue on 1st January he is clearly bound by S. 66 and if he is bound by S. 66 the plaintiff cannot maintain this suit.

In this view, therefore, I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

Mallik, J.—I agree.

Criminal Revn. No. 54 of 1928, Decided on 20th April 1928, from order of Sessions Judge, Assam Valley Districts.

Assam Labour and Emigration Act (6 of 1901), S. 213—Emigration or assisting in the emigration is not an abetment within S. 213—Penal Code S. 107.

Emigration or assisting in the emigration cannot be taken as forming an abetment of the offence of illegal recruitment within S. 213 of the Act. S. 213 expressly refers to abetment as meant by the Penal Code. [P 341 C 2]

Suresh Chandra Taluqdar—for Petitioner.

Debendra Narain Bhattacharji—for the Crown.

Judgment.—This Rule has been issued to show cause why the conviction of the petitioner and the sentence passed on him should not be set aside on ground 2 mentioned in the petition. The petitioner has been convicted under S. 164 read with S. 213, Act 6, 1901 (Assam Labour and Emigration Act) and has been sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 200. The order of conviction and sentence was passed, in the first instance, by a Magistrate at Dibrugarh, and the same has been confirmed on appeal by the Sessions Judge of the Assam Valley Districts. Ground 2 of the petition upon which this Rule has been issued runs in these words :

For that the assumption of the learned Sessions Judge that a recruiting Sardar must accompany every batch of coolies and the imputation of the petitioner's guilty knowledge therefrom are wrong.

There was a considerable amount of confusion in the proceedings that took place in the Courts below in connexion with this case and a perusal of the record discloses certain facts which I shall presently narrate and which will speak for themselves.

The petitioner was an agent of Messrs. Midland Bose and Co. at a place called Amingaon. Messrs. Midland Bose and Co. are the forwarding agents of tea labourers recruited in different parts of India. Certain coolies were recruited for the Madhuting Tea Estate by one B. K. Banerji who, however, did not have a license for recruitment of coolies. The said coolies were dispatched by Messrs. Midland Bose and Co. to Amingaon and the petitioner received those coolies and sent them to the Madhuting Tea Estate. These shortly are the facts of the case upon which the petitioner was tried. The Manager of the Madhuting Tea Estate was at first put upon his trial when it was discovered that the said B. K. Banerji had no license to recruit coolies and he was convicted. Thereafter it appears that a complaint was lodged in the Court of the Magistrate at Dibrugarh by somebody whose initials cannot be deciphered in these words :

To the Magistrate, Dibrugarh, Sir. I have the honour to apply for summons against the following accused under Ss. 164/213, Act 6, 1901. The history of the case is herewith put up.

The name of the accused was given as "A. R. Bose of Amingaon, agent to Messrs. Midland Bose and Co." The history of the case which is said to have been put up along with the complaint consists of a sheet of paper which is headed as containing :

points in respect of and relevant to the illegal recruitment of coolies by B. K. Banerji and the assistance rendered in these transactions by A. R. Bose.

It refers to four challans by their numbers and dates and states that the said A. R. Bose assisted and caused to emigrate the coolies mentioned in the said challans in contravention of Act 6 of 1901. On this complaint, summons appears to have been issued against the petitioner under Ss. 164/213 of the Act. No copy, however, of this summons is to be found in the record. But the summons, that were issued on the witnesses are available and they show only that the offence for which the petitioner was being tried was an offence under the Emigration Act. There is no reason to suppose that the summons that was issued against the petitioner was in different terms. However that may be, an offence under S. 164 read with S. 213, Act 6, 1901 is an offence relating to a summons case and S. 242, Criminal P.C., evidently applies to the trial of such a case. It does not, however, appear from the record that the substance of the accusation that the prosecution desired to make against the petitioner was made known to him in accordance with the provisions of S. 242, Criminal P. C. If, in point of fact, the provisions of this section were not complied with, then that would in itself be a ground for setting aside the whole trial. I am not sure, however, whether the said provisions were complied with or not. All that can be said is that there is no record with reference to this matter amongst the papers that are before me. Thereafter, it appears, one witness was examined on behalf of the prosecution, namely U. C. Burdalo, who happened to be the Manager of the Madhuting Tea Estate. It is really upon the evidence of this witness, coupled with the documentary evidence that was adduced in the case that the conviction of the petitioner is based. It may be mentioned here that of the four challans that are referred to in the history of the case that was filed along with the petition of complaint, the one which concerns the present case is Challan No. 172 bearing date the 17th April 1926, the challan relating to the dispatch of 16 coolies. From the note as regards the history of the case, it would appear that the petitioner was charged with having assisted in the emigration of the said 16 coolies referred to in challan No. 172. That substantially may be taken to be the case that was put forward against the petitioner by the prosecution in the trial Court. In the judgment which the learned Magistrate passed convicting the petitioner under S. 164 read with S. 213 of the Act, he, first of all, set out the facts relating to the parts taken in the affair by the Manager of the Madhuting Tea Estate, and B. K. Banerji and Messrs. Midland Bose and Co. Having done so, he stated the facts that the accused received the coolies illegally as the emigrating agent B. K. Banerji had no license for recruitment of coolies and that the accused forwarded the said coolies from Amingaon to the Madhuting Tea Estate.

The learned Magistrate then stated in his judgment that the accused must have been well aware that the Madhuting Tea Garden had sent no licensed recruiter for recruitment of the coolies and thereafter he recorded a finding to the effect that no recruiting sardar accompanied the coolies to Amingaon and that when the accused dispatched them from Amingaon no garden sardar was sent along with the coolies. From these findings the learned Magistrate ultimately recorded a general finding to the effect that the accused took part in the illegal recruitment with full knowledge that the recruitment was illegal. Reading the judgment of the learned Magistrate as a whole, it seems to me that he did not keep in view the distinction between the different kinds of offences that are contemplated by S. 164 of the Act. That section runs in these words :

Whoever knowingly recruits, engages, induces or assists or attempts to recruit, engage, induce or assist any person to emigrate in contravention of any of the provisions of this Act, etc.

If the case that was put forward against the petitioner in the petition of complaint was to be adhered to, the only question which the Magistrate had to determine was whether the petitioner had assisted in the emigration of the coolies because the petition of complaint read with the history of the case did not refer to any abetment on the part of the petitioner in the recruitment itself. Emigration is defined in S. 2, Cl. (e) of the Act and whether the definition confines the meaning of the word to the departure of the coolies from a particular point or whether emigration consists in the entire process of the journey made by the coolies from the point from which they depart till they reach the garden for which they are recruited, it is quite clear that the process of emigration is entirely different from the process of recruiting and S. 164 makes that distinction perfectly clear, for it says "recruits any person to emigrate." In my opinion, there can be no question that the process of recruiting must terminate before the process of emigration begins. The learned Magistrate does not appear to have kept this distinction in view at the time when he convicted the accused. One thing, therefore, is quite clear that it was not possible for the petitioner to ascertain with any degree of precision what exactly was the case that he had to meet at the trial that was held against him. Assuming, however, that the word "recruitment" has been used by the learned Magistrate in his judgment in a general sense and as not different from the word "emigration" but as consisting of one and the same process, the learned Sessions Judge, it appears, in dealing with the case, had confined his attention entirely to the recruitment that was made of the coolies. Para. 2 of the learned Sessions Judge's judgment makes this point perfectly clear. What the learned Judge says therein is this, and here I quote his own words from his judgment :

It is common ground that the recruitment was illegal and that the appellant assisted in such recruitment. It was argued that there was no evidence that he did so knowingly. The learned Public Prosecutor pointed out in reply that there is no evidence that any competent or approved person within the meaning of S. 44 (S. 76) of the Act accompanied the party. It being admitted that no garden sardar accompanied them and the nature of the escort being a matter particularly within the observation of the appellant, if only for his own protection, I hold there is sufficient ground for finding that the appellant knew the labourers to be illegally recruited.

Now, it is clear to my mind that the learned Sessions Judge was convicting the accused of having abetted the illegal recruitment of the coolies knowing that such recruitment was illegal. To this view, there are two objections. In the first place, that was not the case upon which the accused was tried, the case against him having been, as I have already stated, one of assisting in the emigration of the coolies; and secondly, if emigration or assisting in the emigration be taken as forming an abetment of the offence of illegal recruitment, then it cannot be an abetment which is contemplated by S. 213 of the Act, for it is clear that this is not a form of abetment—an abetment after the fact—which the Indian Penal Code takes cognizance of. S. 213 expressly refers to abetment as meant by the Indian Penal Code. For these reasons, I am of opinion that there has been no proper trial of the case as against the petitioner nor have any facts been established which would call for any further trial of the petitioner. The rule should, in my opinion, be made absolute and I order accordingly. The conviction of the petitioner and the sentence passed on him are set aside and the fine, if paid, will be refunded.

Civil Revn. No. 760 of 1927, Decided on 17th August 1927, from order of 2nd Sub-Judge, Howrah, D/- 7th May 1927.

Civil P. C., O. 17, R. 2, and O. 26, R. 8—Application to set aside ex parte decree—Defendant asking for his examination on commission—Application granted and evidence taken—Defendant not present on the day fixed for hearing of the case though ordered—No instructions to the pleader—Case dismissed for default—Case is governed by O. 17, R. 2—Court is under no obligation to read evidence on commission.

On an application to set aside the ex parte decree the defendant asked for his examination on commission. The prayer was granted, and the parties were directed to come ready on the day fixed, on which day the evidence taken on commission was recorded in the report but the pleader who had been appearing for the defendant said that he had no instructions. Defendant was also absent. Thereupon the Judge treated the matter as a case of default and dismissed it.

Held: that the dismissal was right as the case was governed by R. 2, O. 17. [P 342 C 2]

Rankin, C. J.—This is a point of practice. It appears that there was a mortgage suit which was decreed ex parte on 25th November 1925. The defendant who is the applicant before us to-day brought his application under O. 9, R. 13, Civil P. C., on 5th January 1927 to have that ex-parte decree set aside and the suit restored for hearing. That application having been filed and registered on 12th February it appears from the order sheet the case was adjourned to 5th March 1927. In the meantime a petition supported by an affidavit was made by the defendant asking for his examination on commission, but in the end the case was adjourned to 26th March for hearing and again to 30th April and the present applicant filed a petition with a medical certificate and again prayed for his examination on commission on the ground of illness. This time the application was granted on the term that the execution of the commission would not be a ground for any further adjournment and the parties were directed to come ready on the day fixed. The commissioner finished his work on 30th April 1927, and on that day it was ordered on both parties' prayer for time let the case be adjourned to 7th May 1927 for hearing. Parties must come ready on that day.

On the day in question—7th May 1927—the position was this that the evidence taken on commission was recorded in the report, but the pleader who had been appearing for the defendant said that he had no instructions. Thereupon the learned Judge treated the matter as a case of default. He said:

The applicant does not appear on calls. His pleader states that he has no instructions in the case to-day. The opposite party is present. Let the case be dismissed for default with costs Rs. 8.

Now, the learned advocate for the petitioner contends before us that that course was improper and that what should have been done was this: that evidence taken on commission together with any other evidence which the plaintiff might adduce should have been considered and the case should have been decided on its merits though in the absence of the defendant. That question turns upon two other questions: the first is whether or not the case before us in the events which happened was governed by R. 2, O. 17 of the Code or by R. 3. On that question it seems to me that the case is within R. 2. It is quite true that in the order as recorded it appears that the adjournment was made on the application of both parties. It is quite true that there is that notice that parties would get no further adjournment in the words "parties must come ready on that day." Still I do not think that, that is what is contemplated by the terms of R. 3. R. 2:

begins by:
where on any day to which the hearing of the suit is adjourned

(it does not say at whose instance it is adjourned)

the parties or any of them fail to appear:

Rule 3 says:

Where any party to a suit to whom time has been granted fails to produce his evidence, or to cause the attendance of his witnesses, or to perform any other act necessary to the further progress of the suit.

It seems to me that default of appearance in a case of general adjournment before hearing is within R. 2, and that R. 3 is directed to a case where a party is definitely given time in order that he may take a certain step which it is necessary for him to take if he is to prosecute his case, and fails to take that step.

However that may be, a further question arises in this case whether the deposition on commission was evidence on the record of the Court in the sense that the Court was under an obligation to read it and to decide the case upon it even if there was no appearance at the hearing of the defendant. On that question we have been referred to the case of Dhanu Ram v. Murli Mahto (1) where it is said that it is not the practice in the mofussil to make a formal tender of the evidence taken on commission. It seems to me, however, that for the purpose of the present question before us it is necessary to look somewhat accurately on what is said by the Code and in that connexion the language O. 26, R. 8, which is in the form of S. 390 of the previous Code must be regarded. R. 8 says that evidence taken under a commission shall not be read as evidence in the suit without the consent of the party against whom the same is offered unless certain facts are present, for example, the person who gave the evidence is beyond the jurisdiction of the Court or the Court in its discretion dispenses with the proof of any of the circumstances and authorizes the evidence to be read notwithstanding proof that the cause for taking such evidence by commission has ceased at the time of reading the same, so that, before the evidence taken on commission can be read, the Court has either to be satisfied by proof of certain facts or to be satisfied that the case is such that it should dispense with the proof of those facts. It seems to me that the case Dhanu Ram v. Murli (1) is open to some comment as regards a certain part of the reasoning in the judgment of the learned Judges. It is there said:

Where, therefore, as in the case before us, the circumstances mentioned in S. 390 which would exclude the deposition from being read as evidence in the suit do not exist, there is no reason why the deposition should be formally tendered before it can be treated as evidence in the cause.

In that passage the learned Judges seem to have inverted the character of S. 390 to which they were referring. In that section it is not laid down that certain circumstances shall exclude the deposition from being read as evidence. That section says that unless with the consent of the other party a commission shall not be read as evidence unless there is either proof of certain circumstances which would make it evidence or the Court gives dispensation from such proof. I am not disposed at the moment to make any observation as to what the practice in mofussil Courts may be for any other purpose; but reading O. 26, R. 8, and O. 17, R. 3 as they stand for the purpose of giving a construction to the Code, I am not satisfied that even in a case which is otherwise within O. 17, R. 3, it would be right to say that the Court is obliged to dispose of the case by looking at the evidence upon commission. In my judgment, the Court in this case has adopted the right practice and this Rule must be discharged with costs—hearing fee—one gold mohur.

Appeal No. 1801 of 1925, Decided on 9th January 1928, from appellate decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, Cachar, D/- 6th April 1925.

Landlord and Tenant—Ejectment suit—To succeed, landlord must prove his title.

In a suit for ejectment, the fact that the tenants have not been able to establish a clear title is no ground for the landlord getting a decree unless he can prove his title. [P-344 C 1]

Paresh Lal Shome—for Appellant.

Satyendra Kishori Ghose—for Respondents.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit which was originally brought to recover possession of 12 cottahs and 2 chittaks of land on the allegation that it was part of a dag No. 115 of Re-settlement patta No. 5. The plaintiff's case was that he was in possession of this land all along, but in April 1919 the defendants dispossessed him. The defence was that this land appertained to a neighbouring dag No. 94 of patta No. 11 of a khasra settlement, and had been purchased as far back as 1897, but during the last re-settlement operation the plaintiff wrongly got it included within his patta. The defendants also alleged that in 1919 the plaintiff dispossessed them and there was a criminal case which was referred to a panchayat for enquiry and they got the land back. The first Court decreed the suit, but in appeal it was pointed out that the local inspection by the amin was unsatisfactory and so the case was sent back for further hearing after a fresh enquiry by a qualified commissioner. The commissioner duly made his report and in the result the lower Court then decided that the plaintiff would get a decree for 7 cottahs 4 chittaks of land, the amount which appeared under the re-settlement of 1918 to have been included in plot 115. In appeal the learned Additional District Judge has found that the plaintiff has been unable to prove his title to this land at all and so has dismissed the suit.

In second appeal it is urged that after remand the question of plaintiff's title did not arise and that as the record-of-rights is in favour of the plaintiff, the onus is on the defendants to prove their title and they have to rebut the entry in the record. The only evidence that the plaintiff has been able to adduce is the two pattas of 1900 and 1918, the record-of-rights not conferring, as the Assam Land and Revenue Regulation clearly states, any title at all. Now it has not been shown either that the plaintiff held this land under the patta of 1900 and as to the patta of 1918 there is nothing in his evidence to show that the defence set up is not the fact. The fact that the defendants have not been able to establish a clear title is no ground for the plaintiff getting a decree unless he can prove his title.

In this view the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Piran Ali and others — Opposite Parties.

Criminal Revn. No. 645 of 1927, Decided on 10th and 29th November 1927, from order of E. A. C., Sylhet, D/- 6th December 1926.

Criminal P. C., S. 145 — (Cuming and Cammiade, JJ.) Actual possession means actual physical possession — Symbolical possession obtained through a civil Court is not actual possession — (Graham, J.) Possession must be lawful.

Cuming and Cammiade, JJ.— In a case under S. 145, what the Magistrate has to determine is who is in actual possession at the time or within two months of the proceeding and to declare him to be entitled to possession.

Actual possession means actual physical possession. Actual possession is not necessarily lawful possession. It may be the possession of a trespasser without any title whatever. The person who has obtained what is known as symbolical possession through a civil Court is not necessarily in actual possession.

Graham, J.—Possession means lawful possession and not possession taken by force in defiance of law. No Court ought to recognize such possession.

[P 344 C 2]

Radhica Ranjan Guha for Hemendra Kumar Das—for Petitioner.

Manmatho Nath Rao (Jr.) for Nripendra Ch. Dass—for Opposite Parties.

Graham, J.—In this case a rule was issued calling on the Deputy Commissioner of Sylhet and the opposite party to show cause why the order of the Extra Assistant Commissioner of Sylhet dated 6th December 1926 under S. 145, Criminal P. C., declaring the 2nd party (now the opposite party) to be entitled to retain possession of certain land should not be set aside on the ground that the learned Magistrate erred in law in not upholding the possession delivered to the petitioner (1st party) under a civil Court decree against the opposite party Piran Ali.

On the particular facts in this case the Magistrate's order is in my opinion manifestly wrong, and he ought, I think, to have maintained the decree of the civil Court, and the possession given by it subsequent thereto : Atal Hazra v. Uma Charan (1), Akhoy Mondal v. Basu Rai (2), Kunja v. Khetra (3). The petitioner, 1st party, obtained possession of the land in question through the civil Court on 23rd July 1925, and it is clear that the opposite party No. 1. (Piran Ali (opposite parties 2 and 3 are his sons) has throughout wilfully ignored the decree, and is treating the litigation as if it had never taken place. In my judgment it is not right that the criminal Court should support him in this attitude.

The view taken in the Courts below seems to be that, however much right may be on the side of the 1st party, the only thing that counts is actual possession; and that, possession being with the 2nd party, that party must succeed, no matter how that possession may have been obtained. I cannot persuade myself that this is sound law. Possession as I understand the word, means lawful possession, and not possession taken by force in defiance of law. No Court ought in my opinion to recognize such possession as is claimed here by the 2nd party. The law is proverbially an ass, but I do not think it can for a moment countenance such a state of things as must necessarily follow if the decision, which has been arrived at in this case, is affirmed. The land in question was formerly in dispute between the parties, and one of them went to the civil Court, and in due course obtained a decree followed by possession. The 2nd party ignoring that decision again took possession of the land, and upon the 1st party complaining to the Magistrate he is informed that though he has right on his side, the 2nd party is in de facto possession and, that being so, is entitled to retain such possession until evicted in due course of law. In other words the 1st party, having already been successful in the civil litigation, is to be again compelled to have recourse to the civil Court, and that within about a year of the passing of the decree (the police report was dated 29th May 1926). From the point of view of the 1st party the position seems to be a hopeless one, and the result appears to be due to making a fetish of possession. No doubt it is true that in cases under S. 145, Criminal P. C., possession of the land in dispute is the only point to be decided. But it must, I think, be lawful possession which the Court can recognize, and not the possession of a trespasser and wrong doer.

(1) [1916] 20 C. W. N. 796=33 I. C. 822=28 C. L. J. 555.

(3) [1902] 29 Cal. 208=6 C. W. N. 38.

There is another aspect of the matter. The section relates to disputes regarding land. In this instance the dispute had been finally decided in the civil Court. That being so, there was not, properly speaking, any dispute, the Magistrate had no jurisdiction, and the proper course would, it seems to me, have been to take steps under S. 107, Criminal P. C., against the aggressive party or parties.

For the above reasons I would make the rule absolute on the ground on which it was issued, and set aside the order declaring the 2nd party to be in possession of the land, leaving it to the Magistrate to proceed under S. 107, Criminal P. C. if the adoption of that course is deemed to be necessary.

As my learned brother is of a different opinion the case will be laid before the Chief Justice in order that it may be referred to a third Judge.

Cammiade, J.— Briefly the facts found by the Magistrate are as follows:

The land in dispute is the holding of Piran Ali, the second party. It was sold in execution of a decree and was purchased by the decree-holder, Mathura Nath Das. The sale was confirmed on 10th May 1923; Mathura sold his rights to the first party by two deeds executed respectively in October and November 1923. The first party obtained delivery of possession through Court on 8th July 1925. The property consists of about 14 bighas of land, comprising arable lands and two homesteads in the occupation of the second party. The latter were not removed from the homesteads at the time delivery of possession was given. All that the peon did was to read his writ and plant a bamboo on the arable land. Aus paddy was standing on that land at the time possession was delivered. The second party reaped this paddy. The first party instituted criminal proceedings, which were dismissed. The second party then grew winter paddy on the land and harvested it. The first party attempted to take possession in April and was resisted. He then applied for possession under the provisions of S. 145, Criminal P. C.

These being the findings, the Magistrate was, in my opinion, right in declaring that the second party were in possession.

The law provides summary remedies for the recovery of possession when the party in possession is ousted unlawfully. These remedies are provided in S. 145, Criminal P. C., and S. 9, Specific Relief Act. A person entitled to these remedies must apply to the Court within the time prescribed; and, if he fails to apply within such time, he can only fall back on the ordinary remedy, namely a suit.

It is expressly provided in S. 145 that the Magistrate will uphold the possession of the person whom he finds to be in possession, except in cases when one of the parties had been ousted from possession within two months of the date of the Magistrate's order passed under the first sub-section of that section. In this case, the Magistrate's order is dated 3rd June 1926. As the Magistrate has found that the second party had been in possession at least from the month of August previous, no other order was possible except the one the Magistrate has passed. In these circumstances I would discharge this rule.

Cuming, J.— This rule was granted on the following ground:

That the learned Magistrate erred in law in not upholding the possession delivered to the petitioner under the civil Court decree against the opposite party, Piran Ali.

Owing to a difference of opinion between my learned brother Graham and my learned brother Cammiade the case has been laid before me for decision

The facts will appear to be these :

The land in dispute was originally the holding of Piran Ali, the second party. The land was mortgaged. The mortgagee obtained a decree on his mortgage, sold the property and purchased it himself. He sold his interest to the present first party and the first party applied to the Court and was put in possession on 23rd July 1925 by the planting of a bamboo. In other words he was given symbolical possession. The second party remained in actual possession. Then, on 30th April 1926, the first party applied to the Magistrate. Proceedings were drawn up under S. 145. The Magistrate found the second party in possession and declared him entitled to possession.

Against this order the rule has been obtained.

The first party argues that as possession was delivered to him on 23rd July 1925 by the civil Court the Magistrate is bound to maintain that possession.

The opposite party contends that all the Magistrate has to determine is who is in actual possession at the time or within two months of the proceeding and to declare him to be entitled to possession. Each party has cited numerous rulings to support his contention. The first party relies on the cases reported: Shama Sundari v. Jardine, Skinner and Co (4), Rai Mohan Roy v. J. P. Wise (5), Ranee Gunge Coal Association Ltd. v. Hemlal (6), In re. Chutrapput Singh (7), Gobind Chunder Moitra v. Abdul Sayad (8), Akhoy Mondal v. Basu Rai (2), Atal Harara v. Uma Charan (1), Gulraj v. Bhatoo (9), Kedar v. Lalit (10) and Gordan Sims v. Johurry Lal (11), while the second party relies on Lowsan Santal v. Kali Charan Santal (12), Atul v. Sri Nath (13), Hazari Khan v. Nafar

Chandra (14), Rakhal Dolui v. Nakham Lal (15), Kulada v. Danesh (16), Shahabaj v. Bhajahari (17). A consideration of these decisions undoubtedly would go to show that the rulings cited by each party support the view he would have taken and in this view the matter probably should go before a Full Court. But as a Judge sitting alone, I have no power to make such a reference. So far as I am concerned this is perhaps fortunate, for in view of the contrary decisions I am able to approach the question unfettered by former decisions and to decide it on the plain and simple words of the section itself. With great respect to the learned Judges who are responsible for some of the decisions I cannot but feel that the exact words of the section and the purpose for which it was enacted have been sometimes lost sight of. The aim and object of the section is in my opinion the maintenance and preservation of the public peace and nothing else. No rights are to be decided under it. It is no doubt for reason that the revisional power of the High Court was expressly excluded under the Code before 1923. I will, therefore, cite the material portions of the section which are these:

Whenever a District Magistrate, Sub divisional Magistrate or Magistrate of the 1st Class is satisfied from a police report or other information that a dispute likely to cause a breach of the peace exists concerning any land or water or the boundaries thereof within his jurisdiction he shall make an order in writing stating the grounds of his being so satisfied and requiring the parties concerned in such dispute to attend his Court in person or by pleader within a time to be fixed by such Magistrate and put in written statements of their respective claim as respects the facts of actual possession of the subject in dispute.

The word "actual" requires to be heavily underlined. It is the omission I think to consider the meaning of the word "actual" which has led to the numerous conflicting rulings in this Court.

Sub-sections (2) and (3) are not material.

Sub-section (4) runs:

The Magistrate shall without reference to the merits of the claim of any such party to a right to possess the subject of dispute peruse . . . and if possible decide whether any and which of the parties was at the date of the order before mentioned in such possession of the said subject.

Proviso (1) may be also noted. It is not necessary to cite it at length. The material portions of this subsection are the words I have underlined (italicized). What is abundantly clear is, therefore, that what the Magistrate has to decide is, who is in actual possession.

The words 'such' possession obviously refer to the actual possession mentioned in sub-S. (1). He is not to decide the merits of the claim of the parties to a right to possess the subject of dispute. The section specifically states he is not to. What then does actual possession mean. As I understand it, it means actual physical possession. It means the possession of the person who has, if I may put it so, his feet on the land, who is ploughing it, sowing or growing crops on it entirely irrespective of whether he has any title or right to possess it. Actual possession is not the same as a right to possession nor does it mean lawful or legal possession. If the Code had meant lawful or legal possession I presume it would have said so. The very fact that the expression actual possession is used shows that the legislature was contemplating a possession other than lawful or legal. This is clear from sub-S. (4) for the Magistrate is not to determine who has a right to possess.

The person who has obtained what is known as symbolical possession is not necessarily in actual possession. If he were, the expression "symbolical" would be meaningless. If the Magistrate must maintain, as has been held in some decisions, the possession given through the civil Court he must at once do what the section expressly says he shall not, namely, determine who has a right to possession and to whom the civil Court has given possession, in other words determine the right to possession.

Actual possession is not necessarily lawful possession. It may be the possession of a trespasser without any title whatever.

The Magistrate is expressly prohibited from determining whether the possession is lawful or not, in other words, whether the person in possession has any title or right and to say that the Court has to decide whether the possession is lawful or not, that is to say, that the Court is to do the very thing which the section expressly prohibits him from doing.

To contend that because the civil Court has decided who has a right to possession that there is no longer any dispute is to ignore realities.

There is no doubt possibly no dispute as to title. But that does not prevent there being a dispute as to who is in possession. What the civil Court had decided in this case was who had a right to possession, not who was in possession. It is not correct to say that in these circumstances the decree-holder or person having a right to possession has no remedies. He had. They will be found in O. 21, Rr. 97, 98, 99, Civil P.C. It is for the decree-holder to avail himself of the provision of the Code to obtain real and effectual possession. I, therefore, agree with my learned brother Cammiade. The rule stands discharged.

Appeal No. 536 of 1925, Decided on 12th January 1928, from appellate decree of Addl. Sub-Judge, Howrah, D/- 22nd January 1925.

Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 148-A—A suit to fall under S. 148-A must be for the entire rent due and not a suit for the cosharer's share of the rent only—Plaint should be looked at to see whether a case does or does not satisfy the test.

A suit which is not one primarily for the whole of the rent due for a tenancy. To discover whether a case does or does not satisfy this test it is necessary to look at the plaint itself, a suit which is primarily for the rent due on the plaintiff's own share is not a suit within the meaning of S. 148-A even though the plaintiff cosharer prays in the plaint that if the defendant objects to pay the plaintiff's share of the rent separately then the cosharer landlord's share should also be included. Case law referred to.

M. N. Roy (Sr.), Byomkesh Basu for Surjya Kumar Aich—for Appellant.

Prokash Chandra Majumdar and Satindra Nath Roy Chowdhury for Jitendra K. Guha—for Respondents.

Cuming, J.—In the suit out of which this appeal has arisen the plaintiff sued for a declaration of his title and confirmation of possession or in the alternative for recovery of possession of the land in suit.

His case briefly was that the disputed lands were held by one Hem Chandra Pachal, defendant 2, as a nontransferable occupancy holding at an annual rental of Rs. 147 odd under the pro forma defendants 5 to 10, that in execution of a decree for rent obtained by defendant 5 under S. 148-A, Ben. Ten. Act, against defendant 2 the said holding was put up to sale and was purchased by plaintiff 1 for Rs. 80 on 22nd November 1920. That he obtained possession through Court and let out a portion of the land to plaintiff 2. An objection was filed by defendant 1, under R. 100, O. 21, Civil P. C., and the objection was allowed. Hence this suit. The case for defendant 1, who alone contested the suit, was that he had purchased the holding from defendant 2 on 22nd June 1913. His case was that the decree under which the holding was sold and purchased by the plaintiff was not a rent decree but a money decree and that nothing passed by the sale in execution of that decree except the right, title and interest of defendant 2 which had already passed to him by the sale on 22nd June 1913.

The Court of first instance decreed the plaintiff's suit with costs, holding that the decree in execution of which the plaintiff purchased was a rent decree. This finding was reversed on appeal, the learned Subordinate Judge holding that the decree under which the plaintiff purchased was not a rent decree but only a money decree and that nothing but the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor passed to the plaintiff.

The sole point which has been urged in the appeal is whether the decree under which the plaintiff purchased was a rent decree, or in other words, whether the suit in which the decree was obtained was a suit properly framed under the provisions of S. 148-A, Ben. Ten. Act. Mr. Roy who appears for the appellant has referred us to a number of cases: the cases of Nandalal v. Kala Chand (1), Brohmandannath Deb v. Hem Chandra Mitter (2), Baikuntha Nath Sen v. Rama- pathi Chatterjee (3), Profulla Chandra Gosh v. Baburam Mandal (4) Jagabandhu Nandi v. Abdul Hamid Mea (5) and Gangamani Biswas v. Raba Ali (6).

For the purpose of this appeal it is not necessary to deal with these rulings in extenso. As far as I can see one principle emerges from these decisions, and that principle is that the test as to whether a suit has or has not been properly framed under S. 148-A, Ben. Ten. Act, is whether the suit is intended to be a suit for the entire rent or not. If the suit is intended for the entire rent due and not merely a suit for the plaintiff's share of the rent only, then the suit would fall under S. 148-A, Ben. Ten. Act, and the decree made in it would be rent decree. To discover whether a case does or does not satisfy this test it is necessary to look at the plaint itself. In the present case the plaintiff stated first that he was the $4\frac{1}{2}$ -annas shareholder and that the remaining $11\frac{1}{2}$ -annas belonged to his cosharer landlords. He further overruled that he and his cosharer landlord realized their respective portion of the rent separately. He then stated that the defendant occupies some 6 bighas 12 cottahs odd land of which the total annual rent was Rs. 14·7-10½ gandas. Further he stated that the cosharer landlords, Nos. 2 to 6, were asked to join in the suit but they refused, that they were asked to state how much rent was due to them from the tenant and the tenant was also asked to state how much rent was due to the cosharer landlords but they refused to state. Hence the plaintiff was entitled to get a decree for his share of the rent under S. 148-A, Ben. Ten. Act. It was then stated that Rs. 16 odd was due from the tenant on account of his share of the arrears of rent for the years 1323 to 1326 B. S., that he had repeatedly asked for the payment of the rent due but he had not obtained it. Hence he brought the suit, that he might be given a decree for Rs. 20-15-9 gandas. He further prayed that if the defendant objected to pay the plaintiff's share of the rent separately then the plaintiff prayed to include the cosharer landlords' share as shown in the first column of the schedule and that in such a case plaintiff would pay the remaining cost of stamp that would be due to the Court. I think it is quite obvious reading the prayer (b) that the plaintiff's case does not satisfy the test which I have already set forth. It is quite clear from prayer (b) that the suit was not one primarily for the whole of the rent due for the tenancy but was one primarily for the rent due on the plaintiff's own share; for he states that if the defendant objects to pay the plaintiff's share of the rent separately then the plaintiff prays to include the cosharer landlord's share as shown in the first column of the schedule. In other words, the suit was for the rent of his own share only and not for the whole rent due. Therefore, the plaint does not satisfy the test which I have already set forth. That being so it is clear that the decree obtained in the suit was not a rent decree but merely a money decree and that nothing passed to the plaintiff under the sale in execution of the decree but the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor. That being so, the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs

Birajasundari Gupta and others — Respondents.

Appeal No. 25 of 1926, Decided on 20th December 1927, from appellate order of Sub-Judge, Mymensingh, D/-15th September 1925.

(a) Civil P. C., O. 21, R. 90—Party committing fraud must prove that other party had knowledge of facts constituting fraud.

Where fraud is committed by any party, it lies upon him to show that the other party had a clear and definite knowledge of the facts constituting fraud at a date beyond the statutory period : 18 C. L. J. 128 ; 18 C. W. N. 1266 and A. I. R. 1921 Cal. 251, Foll. [P 349 C 2]

(b) Civil P. C., O. 21, R. 92—Sale conveys interest only of parties to the suit—Auction-purchaser cannot lay claim to the shares of persons not affected by the sale.

The sale purports to convey the interest of parties to the decree and does not affect the shares of those who are not bound by the decree. Because the sale in so far as the interests of one of the judgment-debtors are concerned is vitiated, the entire sale cannot on that account be set aside. Though auction-purchaser cannot lay claim to the shares of persons who are not affected by the sale he will get good title in respect of the shares of parties whose interest is legally conveyed by the sale. [P 351 C 1]

* (c) Civil P. C., O. 21, R. 90—Sale cannot be set aside in part on the ground of irregularity or fraud—It must be set aside in its entirety.

Order 21, R. 90, speaks of setting aside a sale in its entirety, if it is proved that it is bad on the ground of material irregularity or fraud ; and a sale which is affected by such defects cannot be set aside in part. An execution sale is either wholly good or wholly bad ; it cannot be good and bad at the same time : 32 Cal. 296, Rel. on. ; A. I. R. 1926 Cal. 1219 ; A. I. R. 1924 Mad. 431 and 14 C. W. Suhrawardy, J. — This second appeal arises in connexion with execution proceedings and is by the auction-purchaser in execution of a decree for rent by the landlord against 65 tenants. The tenure was sold on 24th July 1922 in execution of the decree. On 21st August, 1922 two judgment-debtors, Manoranjan Dhar and judgment-debtor No. 55, filed an application to have the sale set aside. That application was dismissed on 4th April 1923. The sale was then confirmed and symbolical possession delivered to the auction-purchaser on 27th February 1924. On 27th March 1924 the respondent, judgment-debtor No. 56, filed an application under O. 21, R. 90 and under S. 47, Civil P. C. to have the sale set aside on the ground of irregularities and fraud. The Munsif in the execution Court overruled all the objections to the sale made by the respondent and dismissed her application. He found that the application was barred by limitation, that the sale-processes were properly served and that though the properties were not sold at adequate prices there was service of notice on the respondents under O. 21, R. 66 and the defect was cured. On appeal the learned Subordinate Judge found that the previous application for setting aside the sale made by Manoranjan and another was collusive, that the sale-processes were fraudulently suppressed and that the respondent had sustained substantial injury in consequence thereof. As to limitation, the learned Subordinate Judge held that he was satisfied on the petitioner's evidence that she had no knowledge of the sale until there was delivery of possession to the auction-purchaser. He further found that the property sold also belonged to a deceased defendant and to some other defendants against whom no decree was passed and as there was no determination of the extent of the shares of those defendants he set aside the entire sale.

Two points have been urged before us in appeal on behalf of the appellant. The first is that there is no sufficient finding by the Subordinate Judge to bring the case under S. 18, Lim. Act, and, therefore, the respondent's application must be held to be barred by limitation. It is argued that the Subordinate Judge has not found that it was on account of the fraud of the decree-holder or the auction-purchaser that the respondents were kept out of the knowledge of the sale and that under Art. 166, Lim. Act, unless time is extended by the operation of S. 18 of that Act, the period within which such application should be made must be counted from the date of sale. No doubt the Subordinate Judge has not said in so many words that it was due to the fraud of the decree-holders that the respondents were kept out of the knowledge of the sale. But reading the judgment of the learned Judge as a whole one can have no doubt that that was what he meant to find. He first discusses the evidence with regard to the service of the various sale-processes and comes to the conclusion that there was fraudulent suppression of the writs of attachment and sale proclamation as well as of the other processes in execution; and then, in considering the question of limitation, he observes that the evidence adduced by the appellant for proving applicant's knowledge of the sale is of the most worthless kind and it bears the stamp of concoction. After considering the evidence the learned Subordinate Judge enters his finding on this point in these words:

I am satisfied from the petitioner's evidence that she had no knowledge of the sale until there was delivery of possession to the auction-purchaser. I find accordingly that the application is not barred by limitation.

Reading the two findings together it is manifest that what the Subordinate Judge means to say is that there was fraudulent suppression of sale processes by the decree-holder and consequently the petitioner before him was kept out of the knowledge of the sale. But it is argued by the learned advocate appearing for the appellant that the Subordinate Judge has wrongly placed the onus of proving the petitioner's knowledge upon the decree-holder or the auction-purchaser. This contention must be overruled, in view of the decision of the Judicial Committee in the case of Rahim-bhoy Habibbhoy v. Turner (1), where their Lordships in essence held that where fraud is committed by any party it lies upon him to show that the other party had a clear and definite knowledge of the facts constituting fraud at a date beyond the statutory period. The principle in this case has been followed in this Court in execution proceedings in the cases of Arjun Das v. Gunendra Nath Basu (2) and Bhusan Mani Das v. Profulla Kristo Del (3). The objection on the ground of limitation must accordingly fail.

The next point is of some novelty and does not seem to have come up for consideration in any reported case. The reason may be that it is a matter of daily occurrence in the mofussil Courts and it has never been thought of sufficient importance to merit consideration. But, as it has been raised it should be examined. The point is that the Court below had no jurisdiction to set aside the entire sale on the application of one of 65 judgment-debtors. As regards the remaining judgment-debtors, two of them had made an application to set aside the sale and failed and the right of the other judgment-debtors to have the sale set aside is at the present moment barred by limitation. It is, therefore, submitted that the effect of setting aside the entire sale is to give the benefit of it to parties who are estopped from questioning the sale or whose right to question it has been extinguished by limitation. Now, the findings of the Subordinate Judge about the application by Manoranjan and another is that it was a collusive affair brought about by fraud and collusion to which the auction-purchaser (the present appellant) was also a party. As regards the fraud in connexion with the publication of the sale processes, he records his findings in these words :

After a careful consideration of the evidence on the record and all the circumstances I find that there was fraudulent suppression of the writ of attachment and sale proclamation as well as of other processes in execution and that the petitioner has sustained substantial injury in consequence thereof.

The learned Subordinate Judge has set aside the whole sale on the ground that in so far as the interests of judgment-debtor No. 27 who had died during the pendency of the rent suit and whose heirs were not substituted on the record and of the defendants against whom no decree was passed were concerned, the sale was a nullity. On this point he observed :

The sale purported to be of the interests of all the judgment-debtors and I think, the omission to substitute the heirs of the judgment-debtor No. 27 vitiates the sale not only to the extent of his share about which there has been no determination, but in toto. The sale must, therefore, be set aside.

This view cannot be supported in law because the sale purports to convey the interest of parties to the decree and does not affect the shares of those who are not bound by the decree ; but the entire sale cannot on that account be set aside. The auction-purchaser in the circumstances cannot lay claim to the shares of persons who are not affected by the sale. But there is no reason why he should not get good title in respect of the shares of parties whose interest is legally conveyed by the sale.

Though the ground upon which the learned Subordinate Judge set aside the sale is not tenable, the question still remains whether on the findings arrived at by him the sale should be set aside in toto or in so far as it affects the respondents' interest in the property sold. The findings are that there was fraudulent suppression of the processes in connexion with the sale and that there was substantial injury inasmuch as the property was sold much below its proper price. Now these findings affect the entire sale. It cannot be said that a part only of the sale was affected by fraudulent suppression of the sale processes. O. 21, R 90 says :

Where any immovable property has been sold in execution of a decree, the decree-holder, or any person entitled to share in a rateable distribution of assets or whose interests are affected by the sale, may apply to the Court to set aside the sale on the ground of material irregularity or fraud in publishing or conducting it.

The rule as it stands does not contemplate a partial setting aside of a sale. In fact it means, if it means anything, that if a sale is bad on the ground of material irregularity or fraud, it can be set aside at the instance of any party whose interest is affected by the sale. Nor does the section, as it stands, give any indication whatsoever that all parties whose interests are affected by the sale must join in an application to have the sale set aside. Take, for example, the case of a judgment-debtor and his mortgagee. The value of the equity of redemption not being much, the judgment-debtor may not deem it to his benefit to question the sale. But the mortgagee who is directly affected by it may apply to have the sale set aside, and if on his application the sale is set aside it seems to me that it must be set aside in its entirety because it is impossible to maintain that the sale is to be held good to the extent of the interest of the judgment-debtor which is indefinite. Various other complications may arise if it is held that where the sale is bad on account of irregularities in the conduct of the sale it can be set aside in part. In the case of a joint decree where the shares of the different defendants cannot be defined, if one of the defendants succeeds in proving to the satisfaction of the Court that the sale is fit to be set aside, the Court can only give him proper relief by setting aside the entire sale as it is not possible in the circumstances to set it aside in part, inasmuch as the interest of the successful defendant is not ascertainable. As at present advised I am quite clear in my mind that Q. 21, R. 90 speaks of setting aside a sale in its entirety, if it is proved that it is bad on the ground of material irregularity or fraud; and a sale which is affected by such defects cannot be set aside in part. An execution sale is either wholly good or wholly bad; it cannot be good and bad at the same time.

Reference has been made to the decision to which I was a party in the case of Rampada Nag v. Kanai Ray (4) where it has been broadly stated that a sale can be partially set aside; and reliance was placed in that case on the decisions in Khairajmal v. Daim (5) and Gopala Ayyar v. Ramanuja Chariar (6). On an examination of the facts of all these cases it appears that what was meant in Rampada Nag's case (4) by the observation that a sale can be partially set aside is that in the circumstances of that case the sale did not affect the right of the objecting party. In that case it was found that the real question to be decided in that case was whether notice under O 21, R. 22, was served on the judgment-debtors. It appears from a perusal of the judgment that a preliminary objection was taken on behalf of the respondent that no second appeal lay inasmuch as it was an application under O. 21, R. 90. That objection was overruled on the ground that non-service of notice under O. 21, R. 22 was a question which could only be raised under S. 47, Civil P. C. There are some observations made in that case which may support the appellant's contention, but the main ground on which the decision is based is that where a notice under O. 21, R. 22 is not served on the judgment-debtor his interest is not affected by the sale.

In Khairajmal's case (5) the facts were that the plaintiffs were not affected by the execution sale under which the defendants claimed to have purchased the property as the purchasers there occupied the character of mortgagees; and their Lordships of the Judicial Committee observed that though the sale could not then be set aside or treated as void by reason of mere irregularity of procedure in obtaining the decree or in execution thereof yet the Court had no jurisdiction to sell the property of persons who were no parties to the proceedings or properly represented on the record. It was accordingly held that against such persons the decree and the sale under it were void even without any proceeding to set them aside. The observation of their Lordships in that case lends some colour to the view that if the sale was void by reason of irregularity of procedure the Court would have the jurisdiction to set aside the entire sale. In the case of Raja Gopala Ayyar

v. Ramanuja Chariar (6) the defect discovered was nonservice of notice under O. 21, R. 22. The learned Chief Justice who presided over the Full Bench after quoting a passage from the judgment of the Privy Council in Khairajmal's case (5) observed that it was a direct authority for the proposition that in such a case it was not necessary to apply to the Court to set aside the sale. In his Lordship's judgment the petitioner could proceed without applying to set aside the sale so as to avoid the limitation imposed by Art. 166, Limitation Act. He could, according to the learned Judge's view, bring a suit for possession of the property sold to the extent of his share but for the provisions of S. 47, Civil P. C. It was accordingly a case in which the party could not apply to have the entire sale set aside on the ground on which he rested his case, but was entitled to claim relief to the extent of his share affected by the sale. On behalf of the respondent reference has been made to the decision in the case of Gangadhar Sarkar v. Khaje Abdul Ayy (7), where it was held that at the instance of one of several co-owners of a putni taluk a sale of the taluk could be set aside as contemplated by S. 14, Reg. 8 of 1819. That decision is based upon the wording of a particular statute and I do not propose to base my judgment on the ratio of that case though on principle it does lend support to the view which I have taken; especially where their Lordships observed:

The sale cannot of course be set aside in part, but there appears to be nothing to prevent a co-sharer suing alone to set aside a sale.

Further, it will not be wrong to seek for analogy the principle underlying the proviso to O 9, R. 13 or to refer to the inherent power of the Court to pass proper order in the interest of justice.

As regards the previous application by two of the judgment-debtors, it has been found by the Court below that it was a collusive proceeding. But even if it were otherwise I think the Court below would have been justified in setting aside the entire sale on the findings arrived at by it.

The result of all these considerations is that we confirm the order of the Court below though not on the ground stated by it. This appeal accordingly fails and is dismissed with costs: 3 gold mohurs.

Graham, J.—I agree. There can be no doubt on the findings arrived at by the Court of appeal below that the sale must be set aside so far as judgment-debtor 56 is concerned. The question then arises whether the learned Subordinate Judge is right in setting aside the entire sale. In my opinion he was. The sale cannot in my judgment be set aside in part so as to make it partly good and partly bad. It must stand or fail as a whole. It is either good or bad. It cannot in the nature of things be both good and bad. If it is set aside at the instance of some of the judgment-debtors, or of one of the judgment-debtors, that order will enure to the benefit of the other judgment-debtors. The adoption of a contrary view would lead to complications. I agree with my learned brother that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal No. 38 of 1926, Decided on 14th February 1928, from appellate decree of Addl. Dist. Judge, Zillah Midnapore, D/- 31st August 1925.

A decree obtained by a cosharer landlord in a previous suit is not admissible in evidence as to rate of rent in a subsequent suit for rent by another cosharer landlord. It does not follow that because one cosharer was suing for the particular amount as representing his share of the rent, necessarily other cosharers would be getting the same amount if the shares were identical or a proportionate amount, unless there was one contract by which the tenancy was created: 22 C. Judgment.—The suit in which this appeal arises was brought by the plaintiff for recovery of 9 annas 12 gds. share of rent at the rate of Rs. 7-2-6 per annum. The plaintiff's allegation is that the rent in 76 annas share is Rs. 11-14-9. The plaintiff claimed rent for the years 1327—30 B. S., with cess and damages. Defendants 1 and 2, who contested the suit, dispute the jama payable by them in the 16 annas share as claimed by the plaintiff and stated that the jama in the 16 annas share was Rs. 8-4 as.-16½ gds. The Court of first instance, on a consideration of the evidence, both oral and documentary, held that the jama payable in plaintiff's share was as claimed by the plaintiff, and that the rent for the period in suit was admittedly in arrears, and decreed the suit with costs against the answering defendants and ex parte against the rest. An appeal was taken by the defendants to the lower appellate Court and the only point for determination before that Court was as to what is the jama payable by the defendants to the plaintiff. The learned Additional District Judge who heard the appeal considered the evidence in the case and held that the presumption in favour of the plaintiff arising out of the entry in the record-of-rights, which states the jama in the 16 annas share to be Rs. 11, odd as claimed by the plaintiff, has been rebutted by several documents, to wit, Exs. A, B, C, D and E, and he found that the plaintiff is entitled to get the jama admitted by the defendants. He, accordingly, modified the judgment of the Munsif and decreed the suit at the rate of Rs. 8-4 as.-16 gds.-2 karas for the 16-annas, and Rs. 4-15 as.-13 gds.-3 karas in plaintiff's share and he allowed damages at 25 per cent. with proportionate costs. A second appeal has been taken to this Court by the plaintiff.

A preliminary objection has been taken to the hearing of the appeal by the learned advocate for the defendants-respondents. It is argued that, as the Court granted a decree to the plaintiff at the admitted rate, there was no decision on the question of the amount of jama within the meaning of S. 153, Ben. Ten. Act. Reliance has been placed in support of this contention on the decision in the case of Nekejaie v. Nanda Dulal Bamkeja (1). That case on its facts is distinguishable from the present case. There the Court held that the plaintiff's evidence was not reliable and that the defendant should consequently get a decree at the admitted rate. There was no decision on the evidence as to what the rate was. The case, as will appear from the report, proceeded on the defendant's admission. In the present case, the lower appellate Court had to displace the finding of the Court of first instance that the jama was not what the plaintiff alleged but was a different jama. In arriving at the conclusion that the jama was different from what the plaintiff alleged, the lower appellate Court considered the evidence, both oral and documentary, and came to the conclusion that the jama was what the defendants allege. In other words, the jama corresponded to the figure admitted by the defendants. It is not a case where the Court merely proceeded on the admission of the defendant. The Court had to decide that the conclusion of the Court of first instance that the jama was as the plaintiff claimed was not the right conclusion. Consequently, it cannot be said in the present case that there was no decision on the amount of rent. In this view, I do not think there is any substance in the preliminary objection which must, accordingly, be overruled.

On the merits it has been argued by the learned advocate for the appellant that the lower appellate Court has committed an error of law in deciding the appeal on inadmissible evidence. It is said that Exs. A, C and D are decrees which were obtained by plaintiffs' cosharers against the defendants, and as the plaintiff, who represents the estate of the late Babu Manik Lal Seal was not a party to the said suit, the decrees were not inter partes and, consequently, are not admissible in evidence. Reliance has been placed in support of this contention on two decisions of this Court in the cases of Abdul Ali v. Raj Chandra Das (2), and Prem Chand Mandal v. Official Trustee of Bengal, 27, C. W. N. p. 56, of the notes portion. The learned advocate for the respondent has relied on a decision of this Court in the case of Byomkesh Chakravarti v. Jagadishwar Roy (3). The first two decisions support the appellant's case. The last decision, which takes the contrary view, was an ex-parte decision in an appeal in which the respondents were not represented. I think that, having regard to the decision of the Full Bench in the case of Tepu Khan v. Rajani Mohan Das (4), and the recent decision of the Judicial Committee in the case of Naresh Narayan Roy v. Secy. of State (5), it must be held that these decrees are not admissible in evidence. As will appear from the case in 25 Cal., the reason for holding that such decrees were not admissible in evidence depended on one circumstance, namely, that the subject-matter of the two suits were not identical. In the present suit the parties are concerned with the share of rent which the plaintiff is entitled to get. It has been argued by the learned advocate for the appellant that there is no evidence to show that there was no contract creating the jama. That is a very important circumstance. It does not follow that because one cosharer was suing for the particular amount as representing his share of the rent necessarily other cosharers would be getting the same amount if the shares were identical or a proportionate amount unless there was one contract by which the tenancy was created. The following observations of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the case to which I have just referred are pertinent to the present question :

This was a recovery by a cosharer as against the Secretary of State of her right in the lands for which the plaintiff is suing in the present suit. It is not in itself conclusive, because the plaintiff was not a party to that suit. Objection, indeed, was made in that suit by the Secretary of State that the Rani could not sue without making other cosharers parties; and the answer made by the Court was that it was unnecessary as the judgment would only decide her right, and would not be binding either in favour of her or against other cosharers. It was rejected by the High Court even as evidence; and this rejection might have been right, if it stood alone. But it was followed by a deed of partition, dated 13th December 1909, between the Rani, an officer of the Court of Wards acting for the present plaintiff, then an infant, and a representative of the Secretary of State, whereby the tract marked yellow was divided between the three parties according to their several shares or supposed shares.

From these observations it will appear that the inclination of their Lordships' opinion was that the findings in the suit by a cosharer landlord in respect of the identical strip of land would not strictly be evidence; but having regard to the fact that the Secretary of State acted on the decree, their Lordships held that it might be treated as good evidence in the case. The learned advocate for the respondents argued that, having regard to the decision of the Judicial Committee in the case of Ramranjan Chuckerbutty v. Ram Narain Singh (6). Such decrees by cosharer landlords, as were admitted and acted upon by the learned Additional District Judge in this case, could be treated as evidence, however weak the value of such evidence might be.

But the distinction between Ramranjan Chuckerbutty v. Ram Narain Singh (6) and the present case lies in the fact that the observations of the Judicial Committee were limited to cases where the subject-matter of the previous judgment was identical with the subject-matter of the suit in which those judgments were sought to be offered as evidence, and their Lordships held that under S. 13, Evidence Act, such judgment could be treated as evidence of a transaction within the meaning of that section. Here the suit by the cosharers was in respect of his own share of the rent in the previous suit to which the present plaintiffs were not parties. Consequently the decrees A, C and D did not refer to the same subject-matter to which the present suit relates. That was a distinction which was noticed in the Full Bench case in Tepu Khan v. Rajani Mohan Das (4) and the majority of the Full Bench held that, where the subject-matter of the previous judgments were not identical with the subject-matter of the suit in which such judgments were sought to be introduced as evidence, the earlier judgments could not be held admissible. With regard to Ex. E, it appears that it is a decision on the question of status of the present defendant and is not relevant on the question as to what is the amount of the jama. That decision also must be excluded from evidence. It appears that the record-of-rights is in plaintiff's favour and it will be for the defendant-respondent to establish whether there is sufficient evidence, after Exs. A, C, D and E are excluded from consideration to rebut the presumption of the correctness of the record-of-rights.

The result is that the decree of the lower appellate Court is set aside and the case remitted to him for re-hearing the appeal on the rest of the evidence which remain after excluding the documents A, C, D and E from consideration in the light of the observations indicated above. Costs of this appeal will abide the result.

Judgment.—This suit out of which this appeal arises was one for recovery of arrears of rent. The plaintiffs claimed rent on the allegation that the annual jama of the holding was Rs. 45-13-6. The defence inter alia was that the rental of the holding was not Rs. 45-13-6 as alleged by the plaintiffs, but Rs. 34-13-9 only. The trial Judge gave effect to this defence and decreed the plaintiffs' suit in part on the basis of the rate admitted by the defendants. The matter was then taken to the lower appellate Court by the plaintiffs but with no better success there. The plaintiffs have come up to this Court in second appeal.

To establish their case that the rental was Rs. 45 odd the plaintiffs filed an exparte decree obtained by another cosharer landlord who had claimed rent on the allegation that the rental of the holding was Rs. 45-13-6. The learned Subordinate Judge held that this decree obtained by a cosharer landlord was not admissible in evidence, and, finding also that even if this decree would be taken as admissible there was a contested judgment in a subsequent case to show that the previous decree was no longer of any value, the learned Judge came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were not entitled to any rent beyond what was admitted by the defendants. Both the learned vakils appearing for the appellants as well as the respondents, and myself have searched in vain for the contested judgment referred to by the learned Subordinate Judge in his judgment. There is no such document to be found anywhere in the record of the case. The second ground on which the learned Judge relied, namely, that there was a contested judgment going against the previous rent decree must, therefore go.

The whole controversy before me centred round the question whether the exparte decree obtained by a cosharer landlord was admissible in evidence or not. The learned Subordinate Judge has held, as I have said before, that it was inadmissible, and for this he relied on the Full Bench case of Surendra Nath Pal v. Brojo Nath Pal (1), which had followed the Full Bench decision in Gujja Lal v. Fatteh Lal (2). But in another Full Bench case in Tepu Khan v. Rajani Mohan Das (3), their Lordships observed that the dictum in the cases in Gujja Lal v. Fatteh Lal (2) and Surendra Nath v. Brojo Nath (1), (referred to above) had been materially qualified by the observations of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Ram Ranjan Chakravarty v. Ram Narain Singh (4). In the 1925 Cal case it was held that a previous decree obtained by a cosharer landlord would be admissible in evidence in a subsequent litigation if the subject-matters of the two suits would be identical; otherwise not. The learned vakil for the respondents contended that the subject-matter in the suit from which this appeal arises was not identical with, but different from that in the previous suit in which the exparte decree had been obtained by a cosharer landlord, and in support of this contention he cited the case of Abdul Ali v. Raj Chandra Das (5). The facts of the case in Abdul Ali v. Raj Chandra Das (5) were very much similar to the facts in the present case. But their Lordships when they held that the previous decree obtained by a cosharer landlord was not admissible in evidence as to the rate of rent in a suit brought by another cosharer landlord on the ground that the subject-matters of the two suits were different gave no reasons why they considered that the subject-matters in the two suits were not identical. It is difficult to understand how it can be said that the subject-matters in the two suits were different. The amounts claimed were no doubt different and the claimants also were not the same. But the real dispute in the two suits was as to what the amount of the rental was. Their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Ram Ranjan Chakravarty v. Ram Narain Singh (4), at p. 542, held that the judgment in a previous suit would be evidence for the purpose of showing what the amount of the rent was. It is to be observed also that in a case that was decided in this Court subsequent to the decision in Abdul Ali v. Raj Chandra Das (5), namely, in the case of Byom Kesh Chakravarty v. Jagadiswar Rai (6), it was held that a decree obtained by a cosharer landlord is admissible in evidence as to the rate of rent in a subsequent suit for rent brought by another cosharer landlord. On a consideration, therefore, of the authorities on the point and specially of the observations of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee in Ram Ranjan Chakravarty v. Ram Narain Singh (4) I am of opinion that the learned Subordinate Judge was wrong in law when he held that the decree in the previous suit was inadmissible in evidence. In my opinion the decree was admissible, and that being so, the case must go back to the lower appellate Court to have the appeal reheard.

The result is that the judgment and the decree of the lower appellate Court

Chairman of the Gauhati Municipality—Opposite Party.

Criminal Revn. Petn. No. 40 of 1928, Decided on 20th March 1928.

(a) Assam Municipal Act (1923), S. 221—Person against whom sanction is not obtained cannot be convicted.

G was the agent of M who dealt in mustard oil which was found to be not genuine. Order for prosecution was sanctioned against G alone, but during trial M appeared and took upon himself the responsibility. G remained absent. M was convicted under S. 221.

Held: that the order obtained for prosecution was against G alone and, therefore, M could not be convicted. [P 359 C 1]

(b) Assam Municipal Act (1923), Ss. 220 to 223—Attention of sanctioning officer should be directed to person or persons to be proceeded against.

Sections 220 to 223 involve that the attention of the officer, who is to give order or consent to the institution of the proceedings, should be directed to the person or persons against whom such proceedings are to be instituted, though a general order or consent to the prosecution may be made. [P 353 C 1]

(c) Assam Municipal Act (1923), S. 30—Chairman can delegate his powers only by written order—Act done by Vice-Chairman with Chairman's express or implied consent is not invalid.

A written order is essential for delegation of authority to the Vice-Chairman by the Chairman of the Municipality, but if there is no such delegation, an act done by the former shall not be invalid if done with the express or implied consent of the latter previously or subsequently obtained. [P 359 C 1]

Kshitish Chandra Chakravarti and Panchnan Ghosal—for Petitioner.

Order.—This rule has been issued to show cause why the conviction of the petitioner under S. 221, sub-S. (1), Cl. (e) read with sub-S. (3), Assam Municipal Act (1 of 1923), and the sentence of a fine of Rs. 100 passed on him under that section should not be set aside on grounds 1, 2 and 3 of the petition.

Ground 1 is to the effect that the trial Court had no jurisdiction to try the case against the petitioner inasmuch as the complaint that was originally made and on the basis of which the case was started was not a complaint made against the petitioner, but was a complaint against the petitioner's gomastha, Gajananda Das and that the Deputy Commissioner had given his consent to the institution of proceedings against Gajananda Das and not against the petitioner. Ground 2 is much to the same effect as ground 1. Ground 3 purports to challenge the validity of the order or consent of the Municipal Board in respect of the prosecutions that is required by S. 318 of the Act.

The Health Officer of the Gauhati Municipality submitted a report to the Chairman of that Municipality in which it was stated that, on 8th March 1927, the said Health Officer has purchased a quantity of mustard oil from Gajananda Agarwalla of the Radha Krishna Oil Mill Company and that on examination of the said sample, in accordance with the provisions of the Act, it was discovered that the stuff was not genuine. By the said report the Health Officer asked that sanction might be accorded to a prosecution under S. 221 of the Act. It appears that the Chairman, on receipt of the said report, endorsed it over to the Vice-Chairman with the following remarks:

V. O. Please see whether prosecution will stand on these cases. Reports are contradictory as it appears to me.

The next endorsement is that of the Vice-Chairman who simply forwarded the papers to the Deputy Commissioner "for favour of prosecution." The Deputy Commissioner as far as can be made out from the papers that I have before me, returned the papers to the Vice-Chairman with a request to report whether a prosecution would stand. The Vice-Chairman, therefore, reported to the Deputy Commissioner that a prosecution would lie under the Assam Municipality Act, 1923. On that the Deputy Commissioner passed an order which ran in these words:

Prosecution sanctioned. Summons to accused under S. 221 of Act 1 of 1923. To Sriyat T. Bhuyan, S. D. M., for disposal.

On the basis of this order that was passed by the Deputy Commissioner, Gajananda Agarwalla, whose name appeared in the report that was originally made by the Health Officer as aforesaid, was put upon his trial before the aforesaid Sub-Deputy Magistrate. On the date fixed for the hearing of the case the said Gajananda Agarwalla did not appear and the petitioner being present in Court, and he apparently taking upon himself the responsibility of any transaction that might have been made by Gajananda and in respect of which the case was to go on, the Sub-Deputy Magistrate proceeded to try the petitioner for an offence under S. 221, sub-S. (1) read with sub-S. (3) of the Act and eventually convicted and sentenced him as already mentioned.

The validity of the proceedings against the petitioner has been challenged upon the grounds that are set out in the rule to which I have already referred. Shortly put, it is urged that the proceedings as against the petitioner were illegally started inasmuch as the sanction that had been given by the Deputy Commissioner was in respect of the prosecution, not of the petitioner, but of his gomastha, Gajananda Agarwalla, and that, in the absence of an order or consent of the Deputy Commissioner in respect of proceedings against the petitioner, the petitioner could not be lawfully tried. It has also been contended that, with regard to the other sanction that is required by law, namely, the order or consent of the Municipal Board, it is only the Chairman who is competent to grant it unless he has delegated his powers in that respect to the Vice-Chairman and that inasmuch as, in the present case, no such delegation has been proved, the Vice-Chairman was not competent to order or give consent to the initiation of the prosecution.

So far as the first of these contentions is concerned, what has been said in the explanation that has been submitted to this Court by the learned Extra Assistant Commissioner is that the original complaint as disclosed in the report of the Health Officer was directed against all persons of the Radha Krishna Oil Mill who could be proceeded against for offences under S. 221 and, therefore, included the petitioner who, on the statement that he made in the course of the trial, is the owner or one of the owners of the Radha Krishna Oil Mill, and that the sanction that was accorded for the prosecution of Gajananda could be availed of for the purpose of the prosecution of the petitioner. Now, S. 221, Assam Municipal Act (1 of 1923) makes punishable the doing of certain acts, and sub-S. (3) of that section says that any person who contravenes any of the provisions of sub-S. (1) or sub-S. (2) shall be punished, etc. The present case is one in which it is alleged that sub-S. (1) of S. 221 has been contravened because the accused person, whoever he was, directly or indirectly, himself or by any other person on his behalf, sold or exposed for sale mustard oil which is mentioned in Cl. (e) of that sub-section. S. 224 says that no proceedings shall be instituted under Ss. 220 to 223—S. 221 being one of those sections—without the order or consent of the Deputy Commissioner or the Sub-Divisional Magistrate. The law contemplates that, with regard to proceedings to be started in respect of matters coming within the purview of Ss. 220 to 223, the Deputy Commissioner or the Sub-Divisional Officer will take into consideration the facts of each particular case and come to a conclusion as to whether proceedings should or should not be started. This necessarily involves that the attention of the officer who is to give his order or consent to the institution of the proceedings should be directed to the person or persons against whom such proceedings are to be instituted. While I do not agree with the petitioner's contention that a general order or consent to proceedings under any of these sections against any person or persons who may be concerned in the acts may not be made or given, I am of opinion that the order that was actually passed in the present case by the Deputy Commissioner and the terms of the report on it was endorsed preclude the supposition that the Deputy Commissioner meant to do anything else than consenting to or ordering the prosecution of Gajananda Das.

The fact that, in the report that was submitted by the Health Officer, Radhakrishna Oil Mill was mentioned is not sufficient to disclose that any offence was committed by the owner or owners of the Mills: all that was said was Gajananda Das had committed the offence and the order passed by the Deputy Commissioner cannot be read as authorizing the summoning of anybody else than Gajananda Das. In my opinion it was not open to the trial Magistrate to attach the order or consent that had been previously obtained for the proceedings against Gajendra Das to the prosecution of anybody else. The first contention, therefore, is well founded.

Then, as regards the other contention of the petitioner, namely, as to the competency of the Vice-Chairman to sanction the prosecution of the petitioner, the position seems to be this: Under S. 318 of the Act no prosecution for an offence under the Act can be instituted without the consent of the Board. Under S. 29, the Chairman is authorized to exercise all the powers by the Act in the Board for the transaction of the business connected with the Act or for the purpose of making any order authorized thereby. S. 30 empowers the Chairman to delegate his powers in this respect by a written order to the Vice-Chairman subject to certain restrictions. There is a proviso to that section which says that nothing done by the Vice-Chairman which might have been done under the authority of a written order from the Chairman shall be invalid for want of defect of such written order if it be done with the express or implied consent of the Chairman previously or subsequently obtained.

Section 30, therefore, means that a delegation by a written order is essential; but, if there is no such delegation, an act done by the Vice-Chairman shall not be invalid if done with the express or implied consent of the Chairman previously or subsequently obtained. In the explanation that has been submitted by the learned Extra Assistant Commissioner, it is stated that there is in existence a general order of the Chairman in writing authorizing the Vice-Chairman to prosecute people for offences under this Act. No details, however, of this general order have been given in the explanation and there are no sufficient materials on the record from which it can be ascertained whether there was in this case any express or implied consent of the Chairman, previously or subsequently obtained within the meaning of the proviso to S. 30. Were this, however, the only ground on which the proceedings could be held to be defective, possibly, I would not have interfered in view of the fact that the objection to the validity of the Vice-Chairman's order was not a point that was made at any time in the course of the trial. The other contention, to which I have already referred, in my opinion, is more substantial, and on it this Rule should in my judgment be made absolute. I accordingly set aside the conviction of the petitioner that is complained of in this Rule and direct that the fine, if paid by him, be refunded.

Criminal Revs. Nos. 272 and 273 of 1928, Decided on 3rd May 1928.

A copy has been defined as that which comes so near the original as to suggest the original to the mind of the spectator. It is always a question of fact that the Court will examine the degree of resemblance: (1905) 1 Ch. 519 and A. I. R. 1925 Cal. 220, Foll. [P 360 C 1]

In deciding whether there is an infringement of copyright in pictures, the question is whether the offending pictures are copies of substantial portions of the copyright pictures. The figures may have been reduced in the offending pictures and slight modifications may have been introduced or the clothes and colours may have been different but it is sufficient if the main figures have an identical pose. [P 360 C 1]

*Brojendra Mitter and Preonath Dutt—*for Petitioners.

*Langford James, Jatish Chunder Guha and Suresh Chander Taluqdar—*for the Crown.

C. C. Ghose, J.—These are two Rules calling upon the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta to show cause why the conviction and sentence under S. 7, Indian Copyright Act (Act 3 of 1914), made and passed on the petitioners, should not be set aside on the ground that on the facts there was no infringement of the copyright of the complainant in the pictures referred to herein.

The case for the prosecution is that the complainant is the owner, inventor or designer of certain pictures being Exs. 1, 4 and 7, and that the offending pictures, Exs. 13, 14 and 15, are infringements of the copyrights in respect of the original pictures. The Magistrate has, after careful consideration, come to the conclusion that the case for the prosecution is correct, and has accordingly convicted the petitioners, and has sentenced them each to pay a fine of Rs. 100 or in default to suffer simple imprisonment for a period of one month.

The complainant alleges that the offending pictures, Exs. 13, 14 and 15, are copies of his said original pictures and that it is immaterial whether the copy in each case is or is not of the same size as the original pictures. Now, what is a copy? A copy has been defined as that which comes so near the original as to suggest the original to the mind of the spectator: per Kekewich, J., in (1905) 1 Ch. 519. It is always a question of fact that the Court will examine the degree of resemblance: see Imperial Tobacco Co. v. Atlantic Tobacco Co. (1). It is argued, however, that the three pictures, Ex. 1, 4 and 7, are representations of a familiar subject in Vaishnav literature and, unless there is in the offending pictures similarity in the scheme, treatment and design, there can be no infringement: see 8 Hals 197. In this case, the learned Chief Presidency Magistrate has gone into the question very carefully and there are good grounds for his conclusion that the offending pictures have been produced by taking copies of Ex. 1, 4 and 7 by having them retouched, i. e., painted over in different colours and using these retouched pictures as originals for making negatives, blocks and pictures by the ordinary three colour process. No doubt the sentiment expressed in the copyright pictures is common in Vaishnav literature, but the question is whether the offending pictures are copies of substantial portions of the copyright pictures. In my view there can be only one answer to this question and it is in the affirmative. The figures may have been reduced in the offending pictures and slight modifications may have been introduced, or the clothes and colours may have been different, but there can be no doubt whatsoever that the main figures have an identical pose. These are not, in my opinion, coincidences due to the pictures being produced to represent common stock ideas. If once that conclusion is reached, it is difficult to see on what grounds the orders made by the Magistrate can be challenged. In my opinion, the petitioners have failed to show any grounds for interfering with the orders complained of and I would accordingly discharge these rules.

Appeal No. 77 of 1923, Decided on 25th May 1925, from original decree of 3rd Sub-Judge, Mymensingh, D/- 20th January 1923.

Kali Kinkar Chakraverty — for Appellant.

Tarak Chandra Chakraverty and Prafulla Chandra Chakraverty — for Respondents.

Walmsley, J.—This appeal is preferred by the defendant. He is the eldest son of Mucharu who died leaving five sons, including the appellant and a widow. One of the sons, namely Dharendra, died childless after his father and his interest passed to his mother Soudamini. The other three sons and the mother brought the suit out of which this appeal arises against the defendant Mohesh for partition of the properties left by Mucharu claiming a share of 4/5ths for themselves and admitting the defendant's share to be 1/5th. Mohesh in defence set up a will executed by Mucharu in January 1918, about three weeks before his death, and, after the institution of the present suit, he applied for probate of that will and succeeded in obtaining probate, after a struggle, on 13th January 1922. In this case, Mohesh contends that the will of which he has obtained probate gives him a one-fourth share in the money-lending business and a share of six-annas odd in the jote properties left by Mucharu and that a decree for partition must not override the provisions of the will.

So far as the money-lending business is concerned, the learned Judge of the Court below has accepted the defendant's proposition that he is entitled to the share allotted to him by the will. The appeal relates to the jote properties only. In regard to them, the learned Judge has held that the will did not operate to disturb the ordinary mode of devolution. It is contended before us on behalf of the defendant-appellant, that the learned Judge was wrong in taking this view and that the defendant ought to be allowed the share mentioned in the will. There is no provision in the Bengal Tenancy Act on the question whether a raiyat having a non transferable right of occupancy can bequeath that right. S. 26 of the Act alludes to what happens when the raiyat dies intestate, but that is all. Consequently the matter is one which has to be determined by custom and usage. In regard to that, there is no evidence in this case. The learned Subordinate Judge has referred to three decisions of this Court upon the question whether such a raiyat ordinarily has a right to bequeath his occupancy jote. One of the cases is the case of Amulya Ratan Sarkar v. Tarininath De (1), which was followed shortly afterwards by the case of Kunja Lal Roy v. Umesh Chandra Roy (2). In both these cases it was held that such a raiyat had not the right to bequeath his jote interest. The same view was adopted in the case of Umesh Chandra Dutt v. Joynath Das (3), where Mr. Justice Chatterji, in delivering his judgment, referred to the argument that the Full Bench decision in the case of Dayamayee v. Ananda Mohun (4) had effected the question and expressed his view that it had not done so. I refer to that case because it has been contended before us that the principle of the rulings I have mentioned has been changed, first by the decision in Dayamayee's case (4) and then by the decision of the Special Bench in the case of Chandra Binode Kunda v. Alla Bux Dewan (5).

I fully agree with what Mr. Justice Chatterji said with reference to the argument based on Dayamayee's case (4). With regard to Chandra Binode's case (5) our attention has been drawn to the judgment delivered by Mukherji, J., in that case, and it is urged that he himself cast a doubt on his own decision in Amulya Ratan's case (1). To my mind, that is a complete misreading of the learned Judge's judgment. He said that it was not necessary to refer to Amulya Ratan's case (1). He did not say why; but I think it is clear that he regarded the question involved in Amulya Ratan's case (1) as lying outside the question then under consideration. The conclusion in Chandra Binode's case (5) was that the case of Bhiram Ali v. Gopi Kanta (6) was erroneously decided and that the decision of the Full Bench in Dayamayee v. Ananda Mohan (4) could not be supported in so far as it affirmed the principle enunciated therein. An examination of Bhiram Ali's case (6) shows that the question raised by it had not the remotest connexion with a raiyat's power of bequest. I am, therefore, of opinion that the decision of the Special Bench has not weakened the authority of the decision which I have mentioned and I hold that in this cases the learned Judge of the Court below has taken a correct view of the matter and that his decision must be affirmed. The appeal is accordingly dismissed with costs. Hearing fee, ten gold mohurs.

* Limitation Act, Art. 99—Payment of decree amount by one co-judgment-debtor and acceptance by Court—Suit for contribution—“Date of payment” is the date of acceptance of deposit of the money by the Court to the credit of the decree-holder.

Where payment is made by a co-judgment-debtor in Court and the payment is appropriated by Court in full satisfaction of a decree, it is deemed to have accepted the payment on behalf of the decree-holder, it being looked upon as his agent or quasi agent; and, therefore, the limitation for a suit for contribution by such judgment-debtor against the other co-judgment-debtor begins to run from the date of acceptance of deposit in Court. [P 363 C 1]

The criterion must always be whether or not the deposit made in excess of what is due by the person making the deposit, did or did not remain under the control of the person making it : 25 Cal. 814 (P.C.) ; 3 C. L. R. 480 ; 4 Cal. 529; and 36 I.C. 332; Dist.: 3 U. B. R. 261, Rel. on. [P 365 C 1]

Jatindra Nath Sanyal—for Appellant.

Suresh Chandra Talukdar—for Respondents.

Suhrawardy, J.—The plaintiff and the defendant were cosharers in a certain taluk. The landlords of the taluk obtained a decree for rent and when the property was advertised for sale the plaintiff deposited the entire decretal amount in Court which was accepted by the Court and the landlords' decree was recorded as satisfied. The deposit was made by the plaintiff in Court on 4th February 1920, but the money was actually withdrawn by the decree-holders on 14th February 1920. The present suit for contribution by the plaintiff against his cosharer, the defendant, was instituted on 15th February 1923, the 14th February being a holiday. The question that arises in this case is whether the suit is in time. The Courts below have differed on this point, the lower appellate Court being of opinion that the period from which limitation should be reckoned is the date on which the decree-holder withdrew the amount, namely the 14th February 1920. In this view it held that the plaintiff's suit was not barred by limitation. The Munsiff, on the other hand, was of opinion that time ought to be calculated from 4th February 1920, the date on which the money was deposited by the plaintiff. In this view he held that the suit was barred by limitation and dismissed it. The question involved does not appear to have ever come directly up for consideration in any Court in India so far as the reported authorities go. The simple question that we are called upon to decide is as to from what date in the circumstances of this case the period of limitation should be counted as prescribed by Art. 99, Lim. Act. Column 3 of that article says that the time should be computed from the "date of the payment in excess of the plaintiff's own share." There are a few other articles in the Limitation Act in which time runs from the date of payment, for example, Arts. 61, 81, 82 and 107. In all these articles the terminus a quo is laid down as the date of the payment. Column 1 of Art. 99 says that a suit for contribution by a party who has paid the whole or more than his share of the amount due under the joint decree, etc., etc. Neither does column 1 nor column 3 say clearly about payment to any particular person. The word "payment" in Column 3 should be read as conveying the same sense as the words "has paid" in column 1. The appellant argues that the payment is complete as soon as the amount is put into the Court to the credit of the decree-holder. The respondent, on the other hand, contends that there was no payment before the decree-holder drew out the amount from Court. Both of these extreme views may not be correct. But the facts of this case clearly support the contention of the appellant. The money was deposited on 4th February 1920 by means of a challan, the first column of which mentions the name of the plaintiff as the person on whose behalf the deposit was made. Column 2 mentions the name of the person to whose credit the amount was to be placed in the books of the Court, namely the decree-holder. Column 3 gives the number of the execution case and the names of the decree-holder and the judgment-debtor. Column 4 contains the particulars of receipt as the claim, with costs, due to the decree-holder. The following column mentions the amount deposited. On 4th of February the following order was passed by the Court in which the money was deposited :

Judgment-debtor -10 is permitted to deposit the decretal amount as prayed.

This order was followed by another order of the same date :

Money deposited by judgment-debtor 10 and challan filed. Dismissed on full satisfaction.

Now on these facts the question that arises is whether the payment in Court or deposit in Court to the credit of the decree-holder and accepted by the Court was a payment within the meaning of Art. 99, col. 3. In my judgment the deposit or credit in the circumstances, and in view of the order passed by the Court, must be taken to be a payment within the meaning of that article. The money was deposited in Court to the credit of the decree-holder and it was accepted by the Court on behalf of the decree-holder and the decree was satisfied in full.

As I have said, the article does not mention the person to whom it should be made. The question should be looked at from the stand-point as to whether the payment into Court by the plaintiff was a payment within the meaning of the law or a mere revocable deposit. I think that as the payment was made by the plaintiff of the decretal amount, and as he lost all dominion over it, it must be taken to be payment by him within the article. There is the further fact in this case that the payment made by the plaintiff was appropriated by the Court in full satisfaction of the decree, that is, in payment of the decree-holder's due. The Court in this sense may be looked upon as an agent or quasi-agent of the decree holder. It took the money on behalf of the decree-holder, employed it for the purpose for which it was deposited and held it on behalf of the decree-holder. It accordingly, in my opinion, makes no difference when the decree holder withdraws the amount. It cannot be questioned that if the decree-holder were present on the day when the deposit was made he could have withdrawn the amount. To hold otherwise, namely, that the period of limitation should run from the date when the decree-holder withdraws the amount, would be to make the cause of action depend on the act of a third party who may indefinitely postpone it. In Apurba Krishna Roy v. Chunder Money Debi (1), it was held that there was no time-limit for a decree-holder to withdraw the amount deposited in Court to his credit. In that case, as in the case of Hem Chunder Chaudhury v. Brojo Sundari Debi (2), the question was whether any limitation affects the right of the judgment-creditor to withdraw a sum deposited by the judgment-debtor. The learned Judge remarked that the money so deposited could be taken by the creditor at any time after the deposit. In that particular case the money remained in Court for fifteen years. If effect is given to the contention of the respondent, that time should run from the date on which the money was withdrawn by the decree-holder it would seem that if the decree-holder does not draw the amount and allows it to remain in Court for ever, the plaintiff can have no right of contribution against his co-judgment-debtor. This question seems to me to be too absurd to maintain.

As I have stated there are no reported cases directly in point, but there are some cases in which, with reference to the particular facts of those cases, the word "payment," as appears in Art. 99, has been construed. In Sakhamoni Chaudhurani v. Ishan Chunder Roy (3) the facts were that a decree for eighty thousand rupees was obtained against the plaintiff. The plaintiff moved the High Court to stay its execution. It was ordered that such stay would be made if the plaintiff deposited a sum of fifty thousand rupees in the Court below and this was done. It was subsequently, on 3rd April 1885, withdrawn by the judgment-creditor. On these facts the Judicial Committee, without examining the point, accepted the view taken by the Court below that the cause of action arose on 1st April 1885. This case does not settle the point as it was not raised in it and it was not considered by their Lordships. On the other hand, on the facts of that case, it is clear that the money was not deposited to the credit of the decree-holder so that dominion over it had not passed from the judgment-debtor to the decree-holder who could withdraw it at any time he pleases. In Radha Kristo Balo v. Rup Chunder Nandi (4) on 1st March 1873 the plaintiffs in that case, who were judgment-debtors in a previous execution case, made an application to the Court stating that a certain sum was in deposit to their account in another Court and praying that the executing Court would send for so much of the amount as would be necessary to satisfy the decree. The money was received by the executing Court on 1st April 1873 and paid over on that date to the decree-holder. It was held that time ran in that case from the 1st April 1873, when the money was received by the executing Court and paid over to the decree-holder, and, therefore, the suit, which was a suit for contribution instituted on 17th March 1876, was in time. This case does not help us in the examination of the present question. In Fuckoruddin Mohamed Ahsan v. Mohim Chunder Chaudhury (5) the plaintiff brought a suit for contribution stating that the cause of action arose on 7th June 1873, on which date his property was sold in satisfaction of a joint debt. The suit was instituted on 5th June 1876. The plaint was returned to the plaintiff for amendment by inserting the sums the plaintiff was entitled to get from each of the defendants. The plaint was re-filed on 17th July 1876. On the objection as to limitation the plaintiff contended that his cause of action did not arise as was stated in the previous plaint on the date of the auction sale of the property, but on the date on which the sale proceeds were paid away to the decree-holder. The learned Judges upheld the view and remarked :

Upon the facts stated in the plaint it is clear that the cause of action in the present case arose when the sale proceeds were drawn out of Court by the decree-holder.

The report does not say whether the sale proceeds were appropriated before they were withdrawn by the decree-holder in the way in which it has been done in this case. The point of law, as it has been placed before us, did not arise in that case in this form and was not considered.

In the case of Annanda Mohan Roy Chaudhury v. Maniruddin Mahammad, (6), which is not to be found in any of the authorized reports, the view expressed lends support to the opinion I have formed in this case. The decision was in appeal from Original Order No. 367 of 1913 by N. R. Chatterji and Sheepshanks, JJ., and it was held therein that, under Art. 61, Lim. Act, time should be calculated from the date on which the money paid is accepted by the Court and not from the date on which it is deposited in the Court. In that case deposit was made on 5th November 1908 by the plaintiff with an application to the effect that the money might be paid over to the decree-holder. The Court did not pass any order upon that application on that date and directed the matter to stand over till the 14th November for orders. On that date the Court directed the amount to be received and held that the decree was fully satisfied. It was held that there was no payment of money until the Court accepted the money on 14th November and their Lordships supported their view by remarking that, so long as it was not accepted by the Court, it was open to the plaintiff to withdraw the amount. They recorded their opinion in these words :

We think that payment under Art. 61 means payment either to the person to whom it is to be made or into the Court on behalf of such person.

The facts of that case and the opinions expressed by the learned Judges apply to the circumstances of the present case. The question now before us arose before the Additional Judicial Commissioner of Upper Burma in Yinke Supaya v. Maung Kiu (7). There the surety had satisfied the decree obtained by the creditor and sued the principal for recovery of the amount under Art. 81. The question arose as to what should be taken as the date when the surety paid the creditor within the meaning of Art. 81, Lim. Act. The learned Judge held that limitation began to run from the date on which the surety paid the money into Court and not from the date on which the creditor took it out.

I may add that the words of the Limitation Acts of 1871 and 1877 were, the date of the plaintiff's advance in excess of his own, but I do not think that by substituting "payment" for the word "advance" the legislature intended any change of law.

On giving my earnest consideration to the question raised and argued at great length before us I have come to the conclusion that limitation in this case should be reckoned from the date on which the money was deposited by the plaintiff in Court and the Court appropriated it to the satisfaction of the decree. In this view the plaintiff's suit must be held to be barred by limitation.

The appeal is accordingly allowed, the decree of the lower appellate Court set aside and that of the Court of first instance restored with costs in all the Courts.

Cammiade, J.—I agree. The plaintiff, in order to obtain extension of the period of limitation allowed to him under Art. 99, Lim. Act seeks to take advantage of the fact that ten days elapsed between the date on which the money was put in by him and appropriated by the Court to the satisfaction of the decree and the date of the actual withdrawal of that money by the decree-holder. As my learned brother has pointed out, if the plaintiff's contentions were correct, it is to be feared that many persons would be precluded from suing persons jointly liable with them for sums paid by them in excess of the money due from them merely on account of the fact that the decree-holder had failed to withdraw the money from Court. It is conceivable that from many causes, either accidental or due to neglect or wilful omission on the part of the decree-holder, the money in deposit in Court and appropriated to the satisfaction of the decree may remain unpaid to the decree-holder for a number of years; and, if the contention of the plaintiff-respondent were correct as long as the money was not withdrawn by the decree-holder, the person who made the deposit would have no right to recover anything from his co-debtor. This would be an entirely absurd position. The criterion must always be whether or not the deposit made in excess of what is due by the person making the deposit did or did not remain under the control of the person making it. Obviously, when the Court has passed an order to appropriate the money deposited to the satisfaction of the decree, that money ceases to be under the control of the person making the deposit. After such an order has been made it would no longer be open to the depositor to apply for withdrawal of that money. The only person entitled to apply for its withdrawal would be the decree-holder or any other person entitled through him. In the present case such an order for appropriation was passed by the Court on 4th February, the date on which the deposit was made, and from that date limitation must run under Art. 99, Lim. Act I, therefore, agree that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal No. 890 of 1926, Decided on on 8th March 1928, from appellate decree of 4th Sub-Judge, Alipur D/- 28th November 1925.

 Easement—Light—Person selling house having windows overlooking his adjoining land—Vendor cannot obstruct light from coming to such windows by building on the adjoining land—Subsequent vendee of the land is also bound by the obligation.*

If a man sells a house which has windows overlooking adjoining land which he retains he cannot as a general rule, afterwards stop the light from coming to the windows of the house by building on the land for, when granting the house he is presumed to have granted also a right to light to the windows or to have covenanted not to obstruct them and he may not subsequently derogate from his own grant or violate his covenant. So also, if after selling the house, he sells the land to a third person, the latter may not obstruct the light from coming to the windows, for the vendor could only convey the land, subject to the same obligations to which it was subject in his own hands. The true principle underlying cases of this kind is that the vendee is entitled to have the enjoyment of the light and air of the ancient windows in the same manner as it was enjoyed during the unity of possession.

Girija Prosanna Roy Chaudhuri and Khirish Chandra Chakravarty—for Appellant

Judgment.—This is a plaintiff's appeal against the decision of the Subordinate Judge of 24 Parganas, dated 28th November 1925, which reversed the decision of the Munsif of Alipur, dated 1st July 1924. The plaintiff commenced the suit for the removal of a verandah and a wall which obstructed her windows. The case stated in the plaint is that premises No. 91, Kansaripara Road, Bhawanipur, which is at present numbered as 570 of the said road, belonged to the plaintiff's father, Rakhal Chandra Das. The plaintiff purchased a part of this premises from her father on 20th February 1906 and has been in possession of it since her purchase. There is a verandah on the north of the purchased land which she, the plaintiff, claims, passed to her by the conveyance of 20th February but the land underneath the verandah remained with the vendor, her father. There was a stipulation in the deed of sale of 1906 that, if the plaintiff required, the verandah will be removed by the plaintiff's father in case the plaintiff required the same for the purpose of effecting repairs to the purchased land and building. There were also two windows on the disputed land which have been in existence, as the evidence shows, since the building was erected so far back as 50 years from now. The defendant, who is the son of Rakhol and the brother of the plaintiff, has raised a wall right across these windows and this has given rise to the cause of action for the removal of the wall. The defendant, who has now succeeded to Rakhal's estate after his death, also refused to remove the verandah although the plaintiff required the removal of the verandah for the purposes of effecting repairs to her building. Several defences were taken to the suit by the defendant. It was stated that, according to the terms of the deed of sale the defendant is not bound to remove the verandah and that the house does not want repairs. It was further stated that, the windows open on the private apartments of the defendants and the wall does not harm the plaintiff in any way.

These defences were negatived by the Munsif who granted a decree to the plaintiff and directed that the defendant do remove his verandah and wall within a certain date and, if he refused to remove the same, the plaintiff might remove the same at her own cost and then realize the costs from the defendant and that the plaintiff should be given sufficient access of air and light through the two windows which formed the subject-matter of the plaint. An appeal was taken against this decision of the Munsif to the Subordinate Judge 24 Parganas. The learned Subordinate Judge reversed the decision of the Munsif with reference to both the causes of action. He held with regard to the removal of the verandah that the best evidence has not been produced to show that the plaintiff required the removal of the verandah for the purpose of effecting repairs. The plaintiff examined her son, her son-in-law and another witness who all testified to the fact that the plaintiff's house was in a bad condition and required repairs. The learned Subordinate Judge seems somewhat hypercritical in his criticism of the evidence of these witnesses who were most competent to speak to the fact as to whether the house required repairs or not. The learned Subordinate Judge proceeds to state that, in his opinion, there should be definite and best evidence regarding the need for repairs before the defendant can be called upon to remove the verandah in question, and such evidence has not been produced. I think, on a construction of the kobala, it was enough if the plaintiff came to Court and said that she required the removal of the building for the purpose of effecting repairs. The language of the deed of sale is as follows :

If in future you require to repair your buildings then I shall demolish and remove the verandah.

This language certainly suggests that the question as to whether repairs were needed or not would depend entirely on what the plaintiff thought. She now claims the removal of the verandah, because, in her opinion, repairs are required. She has examined her relatives who were most competent to speak to the need for repairs. In the face of this I do not think the Subordinate Judge was justified in dismissing the claim of the plaintiff for removal of the verandah on the ground that the best evidence has not been produced. There has been a defect of procedure in the trial of this part of the appeal which has affected the merits of the case which calls for interference of this Court in second appeal.

With regard to the other cause of action about the removal of the obstruction of the two ancient windows, the Subordinate Judge has also gone wrong. His view is that no right of easement could be acquired as the purchase of the plaintiff was within 20 years of suit and no right of easement could be acquired by the plaintiff as her vendor could not have acquired any such right over his own land. The true rule applicable in cases of this kind is stated in the well-known treatise of Goddard's Law of Easement, 7th edn., at p. 282, where the learned author states as follows :

If a sellmans a house which has windows overlooking adjoining land which he retains he cannot, as a general rule, afterwards stop the light from coming to the windows of the house by building on the land for, when granting the house, he is presumed to have granted also a right to light to the windows or to have covenanted not to obstruct them and he may not subsequently derogate from his own grant or violate his covenant; so also if after, selling the house he sells the land to a third person, the latter may not obstruct the light from coming to the windows, for the vendor could only convey the land subject to the same obligations to which it was subject in his own hands.

The true principle underlying cases of this kind is that the plaintiff is entitled to have the enjoyment of the light and air of the ancient windows in the same manner as it was enjoyed during the unity of possession, that is, when his property as well as the property of her brother remained the property of their father. The principle which I have stated receives support from the decision in the case of Coutts v. Gorham which is cited at p. 129 of Gale on Easement, 10th edn., 1925. In that case the windows were made within 20 years, but before the lease granted by the owner in favour of the person named Coutts, and it was pointed out that, assuming that the windows were made within 20 years but before the lease made to Coutts, Gorham's present interest is derived from the same lessor at a subsequent period, and is, therefore, subject to the rights which Coutts already had against his lessor and, consequently, to that of his having the windows in question free from any obstruction.

I think, in the view with regard to the two causes of action which I have taken, the appeal must be allowed, the decision of the Subordinate Judge must be set aside and that of the Munsif restored with costs.

Criminal Misc. Case No. 36 of 1928, Decided on 15th March 1928.

* Criminal P. C., Ss. 491 and 561A—High Court should not interfere with an order of its own Judge.

It is wrong that the High Court should under S. 491 re-try for itself a question which has already been determined by the same Court in its ordinary original criminal jurisdiction, or to pass an order overriding an order already made by the same High Court.

Langford James and Satindra Nath Mukerjee—for Petitioner.

B. L. Mitter, Khundkar and Mrityunjay Chatterjee—for the Crown.

Rankin, C. J.—In this case Rameswar Khiroriwalla has obtained a rule calling upon the Commissioner of Police and the Superintendent of the Presidency Jail to show cause why the petitioner should not be brought up before the Court under the provisions of S. 491, Criminal P. C.

The applicant was committed by the Chief Presidency Magistrate for trial by the High Court at Sessions in its ordinary original criminal jurisdiction upon charges under several sections of the Indian Penal Code. Each of the charges relates to an offence described as bailable in Sch. 2, Criminal P. C. On 24th January 1928, the applicant was released on bail by the order of Mr. Justice Page. Thereafter an application was made to Mr. Justice Buckland on behalf of the Crown for an order cancelling such bail upon the ground that, on 13th, 14th and 15th February 1928, the applicant had approached certain witnesses for the purpose of influencing their evidence at the trial. Mr. Justice Buckland, on 24th February 1928, made an order cancelling the bail, discharging the bail bond and committing the applicant to custody pending his trial.

The learned Judge in his judgment has carefully considered the meaning and effect of S. 496 and 561 A, Criminal P. C. He has come to the conclusion that the Court has power under the latter section to make such an order, assuming there to be no power otherwise. It is apparent from his judgment that this question was fully argued before him.

This rule came on for hearing before us on the 8th March, by which time the trial of the applicant had begun and was proceeding de die in diem. There can be no doubt, therefore, that the applicant is at present properly and lawfully detained in public custody while the trial proceeds. The only order which we have been asked on behalf of the applicant to make is an order that would direct him to be brought before this Bench after the High Court Sessions had adjourned for the day and which would provide for the applicant to be set at liberty (upon his giving sufficient security) during the adjournments of the Sessions Court.

The argument on behalf of the applicant is first that in view of S. 496, Criminal P. C., the learned Judge exercising the ordinary original criminal jurisdiction of the Court had no jurisdiction in the circumstances to direct the cancellation of the applicant's bail or to direct his re-arrest; secondly, accordingly, the applicant is a person illegally detained in public custody. If these points be made out, then, by the terms of S. 491, the High Court may, if it thinks fit, direct that the applicant be set at liberty or be dealt with according to law.

The High Court, which by S. 491 is invested with certain powers, is defined by S. 4 (j) to mean "the highest Court of criminal appeal or revision for any local area." This means for the present purpose the High Court of Judicature at Fort William in Bengal, which may act under Cl. 36 of its Letters Patent by any Judge or any Division Bench thereof, subject to any rules that may be made or directions that may be given by competent authority. In practice, until recently, the powers conferred by S. 491, which before 1923 were exercisable only over persons within the limits of the ordinary original civil jurisdiction of the Court, were exercised by the Judge taking Sessions, that is, by the Judge exercising the ordinary original criminal jurisdiction of the Court. Now that the powers are applicable to persons within the limits of the Court's appellate criminal jurisdiction, it is certainly more convenient that they should be exercised by the Division Bench appointed to deal with criminal cases. It is not, however, evident to me upon the face of the Criminal Procedure Code that the powers of the High Court under S. 491 might not, apart from any special rule made under the Letters Patent or any directions given by the Chief Justice, competently be discharged by a single Judge. This Bench is in no way a Court of appeal from the learned Judge exercising the ordinary original criminal jurisdiction, and grave inconvenience would arise if the same High Court should make an order for arrest and also an order for release upon divergent views upon a question of jurisdiction. If this be possible, so far as the statute is concerned, it would be possible for a single Judge to make an order overriding and nullifying an order of a Division Bench. A Judge or a Bench which exercises powers under S. 491 has no claim to any particular precedence so as to require that the Sheriff should execute no order made by another Judge or Bench inconsistent therewith. It would introduce an incurable confusion into practice and theory if it were laid down that a considered judgment of the High Court upon a question of its jurisdiction could be challenged before the same High Court under S. 491. In my judgment the circumstance that certain orders of this Court in its ordinary original criminal jurisdiction are not appealable does not affect this matter. It appears to me that a case such as the present should be viewed on the principle that it would be a good return to a writ in the nature of habeas corpus to show that the applicant, during his trial at Sessions, was being detained under an order of this High Court which has not been set aside or varied. These considerations do not apply to orders made by Courts other than the High Court.

It is sufficient for purposes of the present case to say that it seems to me to be wrong that this Bench should think fit under S. 491 to re-try for itself the question which has already been determined by this Court in its ordinary original criminal jurisdiction, or to pass an order overriding an order already made by this High Court. In this view the rule will be discharged.

C. C. Ghose, J.—I agree.

Civil Rule No. 73 of 1928, Decided on 13th February 1928, from order of Dist. Judge, 24 Parganas, D/- 6th Nov. 1927.

(a) Mahomedan Law—Practice—Powers of District Judge as kazi can be invoked in connexion with matters of public and religious trust.

The practice of invoking the power of a District Judge as a kazi in connexion with matters of public and religious trusts under the Mahomedan law has become general and it cannot now be doubted that in a proper case the Judge should exercise the powers which he does possess. [P 369 C 2, P 370 C 1]

(b) Civil P. C., S. 92—Expression “where the direction of the Court is deemed necessary for the administration of any such trust” explained.

The words “where the direction of the Court is deemed necessary for the administration of any such trust” must be interpreted as meaning that where the Court has to give direction in the nature of framing a scheme or otherwise for the administration of the trust. The mere appointment of a mutwalli is not such a direction as is contemplated by the section: 33 Cal. 789, Dist.: 23 C. W. N. 115; 47 Cal. 692; and A. I. R. 1924 Cal. 473, Ref. to. [P 369 2, P 370 C 1]

(c) Civil P. C., S. 92—Appointment of mutwalli—Court can appoint one even without a suit under S. 92.

Where there is no mutwalli, the Court has power to appoint a mutwalli in respect of a wakf even without a suit under S. 92: A. I. R. 1925 All. 759; 26 Mad. 450; and 33 Cal. 789; Dist.: A. I. R. 1924 Cal. 441, Foll. [P 370 C 2]

(d) Mahomedan Law—Wakf—Duty of kazi in respect of Wakf is to appoint new trustee where he finds that there is no one to properly administer trust.

Under the Mahomedan law the administration of a religious and public trust is vested in the kazi and it is the duty of the kazi, when he finds that there is no one to administer the trust, to see that it is properly administered and for that purpose it is within his competency, and it is proper, that he should appoint a trustee to manage the trust property. [P 370 C 2]

Nuruddin Ahmad and Charan Das Gupta—for Petitioner.

Nasim Ali—for Opposite Party.

Suhrawardy, J.—This rule is directed against an order of the District Judge of 24 Parganas dated 6th November 1927, by which he dismissed an application by the petitioners to appoint them as mutwallis of a wakf estate. The facts are that a wakf was created by the ancestor of petitioner 1. Under the deed of wakfnama, the opposite party would be the present mutwalli and after him the petitioner 1. The petitioner's case is that the opposite party parted with some of the wakf properties treating them as secular and thereupon he brought a suit against them in the local Subordinate Judge's Court and obtained a decree declaring the properties as wakf. On these facts he asked the Judge to appoint a mutwalli in the exercise of the powers of a kazi under the Mahomedan law. Opposite party 1, repudiates the wakf and her case is that the alleged wakf was only a paper transaction and that she never acted as mutwalli; on the other hand she treated the properties as her own properties inherited from her ancestor. The learned Judge has held that, in the circumstances of the case, the petitioners' application could not be granted and the only remedy was to have recourse to a suit under S. 92, Civil P. C.

The practice of invoking the power of a District Judge as a kazi in connexion with matters of public and religious trusts under the Mahomedan law, has become general and it cannot now be doubted that, in a proper case, the Judge should exercise the powers which he does possess. Before us it has been contended by the petitioners, that opposite party 1 having repudiated the trust and denied having ever acted as mutwalli, the office of the mutwalli must be treated as vacant and the learned Judge should have exercised his powers as a kazi on an application made to him to appoint a mutwalli. It may be noted here that opposite party 2, who is also a co-mutwalli under the deed of wakf, has supported the petitioner and has expressed his consent to his appointment as a mutwalli. The real fight is between the petitioner and opposite party 1.

It is contended on behalf of the petitioner that in any case in which the power of a Judge is invoked for appointing a mutwalli it comes under S. 92, Civil P. C. I am unable to give effect to this broad contention. It is argued that the appointment of a mutwalli even of a wakf estate, in respect of which there is no mutwalli, comes under S. 92, Civil P. C., because that section makes a suit necessary as has been observed in passing in some of the reported cases on this section and also under sub. Cl. (b) of Cl. (1) of the section for appointing a new trustee. Now there is no question as has been held in Budreedas v. Chooni Lal (1), that S. 92 applies to cases where there is an express or constructive trust created for public purposes of a charitable or religious nature and where there is a breach of trust—which is not the case here—on a direction of the Court is deemed necessary for the administration of such trust; and thirdly, where the relief claimed is one or other of the reliefs mentioned in the section. If a matter comes within the provisions of this section it is clear that under Cl. (2) of the section, a suit under it is the only remedy open to a party. But in my opinion the words, where the direction of the Court is deemed necessary for the administration of any such trust, must be interpreted as meaning that where the Court has to give direction in the nature of framing a scheme or otherwise for the administration of the trust. The appointment of a mutwalli is not such a direction as is contemplated by the section. If the appointment of a trustee comes under the words "where the direction of the Court is necessary," the cases in which it has been held that the District Judge has the power to grant leases and mortgages of wakf properties on an application must be held to have been decided wrongly for, if the appointment of a trustee can be considered as a direction of the Court for the administration of the trust, granting permission for leases or mortgages, is a fortiori such a direction. The case of Ashraf Ali v. Mahommed Nurojroma (2) is a case, where the scope of S. 92, Civil P. C., has been considered and the cases of Fakrunnessa Begum v. Dist. Judge of 24 Parganas (3) and Habibur Rahaman v. Saidennesa Bibi (4) are cases where it has been held that the District Judge is empowered to give permission to a trustee to grant leases of a trust property.

Now with regard to appointing a new trustee it seems, considering the history of S. 92, Cls. (a) and (b), that by a new trustee is meant a trustee in place of an old trustee. Cl. (1), sub-Cl. (a) of the Act, of 1908 did not find place in the old S. 539. It was held by some of the High Courts, including this Court, that S. 539 contemplated removing a trustee and appointing a new one in his place. To give effect to this view the legislature has put the two clauses (a) and (b) in such juxtaposition as to lead one to suppose that appointing a new trustee is dependent on the removing of the old one, or, at any rate, where the appointment of a trustee is necessary in place of a trustee who has either been removed or has ceased to be a trustee. Our attention has been drawn to several cases, Lachman Prosad v. Munia (5), Netiram

Jogiah v. Venkata Charlu (6), which have been followed in several other Madras cases, where there are observation to the effect that where the Court is invited to appoint a mutwalli the matter comes under S. 92, Civil P. C. But on an examination of the facts of those cases it would appear that in those cases there were some persons who were claiming to be mutwallis and the applications were for removing them or removing them from the place they occupied and appointing the applicants as mutwallis. It has been held in Badridas v. Chuni Lal (1), that S. 92 applies as much to cases in which a trustee is sought to be removed as to cases in which a trustee de son tort is sought to be displaced. These cases are, therefore, no authority for the bare proposition that where there is no mutwalli in respect of a wakf, the Court has no power to appoint one except in a suit under S. 92. This view has been adopted in Mohiuddin Chowdhury v. Aminuddin Chowdhury (7). In that case the District Judge, on an application, has appointed a mutwalli in respect of a wakf of which there was no mutwalli then acting. The rival candidate applied to this Court to have that appointment set aside on the ground that the Judge could not pass the order he did except under S. 92, Civil P. C. The learned Judges held that he had such a power. The fact that in that case they also referred to the deed of endowment which stated that, in the event of no trustee being in existence at any time the Court will appoint, one does not seem to me to have affected the application of the law. I propose to follow this case and to hold that where there is no mutwalli the Court has power to appoint a mutwalli in respect of wakf. Under the Mahomedan law the administration of a religious and public trust is vested in the kazi and it seems to me that it is the duty of the kazi when he finds as in the present case that there is no one to administer the trust, to see that it is properly administered, and for that purpose it is within his competency and it is proper that he should appoint a trustee to manage the trust property.

Now, in the present case, the petitioner has come to Court with this allegation on his lips, that there is a valid trust and that the opposite party acted as a mutwalli for a short time and thereafter he began to act in various ways in breach of the terms of the towliatnama and made all sorts of transfers against the provisions of the wakfnama and as the opposite party has thus abandoned his position as mutwalli of the wakf estate the appointment of a mutwalli was immediately necessary for the proper management, preservation and upkeep of the estate. It is true that opposite party 1 does not rely upon the trust and repudiated it, claiming the property as her secular property; but the way in which the Court has been approached in this case brings it within the provisions of S. 92, Civil P. C. I am not sure that in a proper application for the appointment of a trustee in the circumstances that have happened in this case, taking the position adopted by the opposite party into consideration, such appointment cannot be made on an application to the District Judge if a proper case is made out. But the allegations made make me think that the learned Judge is right in saying that it is a matter which comes only under S. 92, Civil P. C., and by Cl. (2) of the section, a suit or proceeding otherwise than under that section is barred. In this view this rule must be discharged with costs: two gold mohurs.

Civil Rule No. 609 of 1927, Decided on 22nd August 1927, from order of Sub-Judge, Khulna, D/- 3rd February 1927, in suit No. 156 of 1926.

(a) Carriers Act, S. 10 — Condition—Contract.

A contract with a carrier provided: "No claim of any kind whatsoever in respect of this contract shall be valid unless in writing and delivered at the office of the Company within six months from the date of any default, loss or damage in respect of which such claim arises."

Held: that the condition was not unreasonable: 8 Mad. 107 and 27 C. L. J. 294, Rel. on.

(b) Principal and Agent—Notice to agent of facts arising out of agency is notice to principal—But parties to contract can stipulate against this presumption.*

Notice of facts to an agent is constructive notice thereof to the principal himself where it arises from, or is at the time connected with the subject-matter of his agency; for, upon general principles of public policy, it is presumed that the agent has communicated such facts to the principal and if he has not, still, the principal having entrusted the agent with the particular business, the other party has a right to deem his acts and knowledge obligatory upon the principal; otherwise the neglect of the agent whether designed or undesigned, might operate most injuriously to the rights and interests of such party. But it is quite open to the parties to a contract to stipulate that this presumption which arises upon general principles of public policy should not arise in any particular case, and that the notice instead of being served on an agent would have to be served on the principal himself. This stipulation viewed in a proper light would mean that express notice is given of the limitation of the agent's authority, and if with such knowledge a party chooses to deal with the agent and not with the principal he does so at his own peril.

(c) Principal and agent—General agency implying delegation to do all acts connected with a particular trade—Principal cannot set up secret and private instructions to the agent.*

In the case of a general agency which implies a delegation to do all acts connected with a particular trade, business or employment, the principles to be borne in mind are: "If a person is held out to third parties or to the public at large, by the principal, as having a general authority to act for and to bind him in a particular business or employment, it would be the height of injustice and lead to the grossest frauds, to allow him to set up his own secret and private instructions to the agent, limiting his authority; and thus to defeat his acts and transactions under the agency when the party dealing with him had, and could have, no notice of such instructions. In such cases good faith requires that the principal should be held bound by the acts of the agent, within the scope of his general authority. The maxim of natural justice here applies with its full force, that he, who without intentional fraud has enabled any person to do an act, which must be injurious to another innocent party, shall himself suffer the injury rather than the innocent party, who has confidence in him."

(d) Limitation Act, Arts. 30 and 31—Suits against carriers in respect of goods delivered for carriage are governed by Arts. 30 and 31—Onus of proving loss more than one year before suit lies on defendants.

It is now well settled that all suits against carriers in respect of goods delivered to them for carriage fall under Art. 30 or Art. 31, according as the claim is regarded as one based upon loss of or injury to the goods or non-delivery thereof. The onus of proving that the loss took place more than a year before suit and that, therefore, the suit was barred under

Art. 80, would lie on the defendants: View of Chatterjee, J., in 44 Cal. 16, held not sound.

Judgment.—The Rivers Steam Navigation Co. Ltd. and the India General Navigation and Railway Co. Ltd. have obtained this Rule to show cause why the decree passed against them by the Small Cause Court Judge of Khulna should not be set aside.

Mulji Sicka and Co. dispatched six bags of mohini biri on 15th August 1925 from Jagannath Ghat to Khulna for carriage by the dispatch service of the two companies. The consignment was deliverable to Bisweswar Kundu who not having received the same instituted the suit claiming Rs. 380, which was made up of Rs. 314-8-0 as the price of goods, Rs. 31, as damages at 10 per cent., and Rs. 36, as interest, deducting a remission of Re. 1-8-0 from the total. The suit has been decreed in full with costs.

The grounds urged in support of the Rule are mainly four. To deal with these grounds it is necessary to set out a few facts, which are not disputed. Enquiries were made about the goods on behalf of the plaintiff and the plaintiff not having received delivery thereof wrote a letter to the agents of the companies at Barisal who sent the following reply:

It was alleged in the plaint that there after there was some correspondence, but we do not know what it was, and though some of it is on the record yet the same has not been proved. On the 1st April 1926, however, the plaintiff sent a pleader's letter to the said agents. It ran in these words:

Various defences appear to have been taken on behalf of the defendant companies in their written statement, some of which were suggested in the cross-examination of the plaintiff's witnesses and were denied by them. These were not pursued any further and it is not profitable to refer to them here. It is necessary only to state that the story of theft, which was alleged as having led to the disappearance of the goods, has been definitely disbelieved by the trial Court. It should further be mentioned that the letter which the plaintiff wrote to the agents at Barisal in the first instance, and which appears to have been dated 2nd September 1925, has not been put in evidence by either party.

The first contention that has been urged in support of the Rule relates to the sufficiency and validity of the notice that is necessary to be given under S. 10, Carriers Act (3 of 1865). Much of the argument that has been advanced on this point is founded on the assumption that it was the pleader's letter of 1st April 1926 that was the notice in this case. The argument overlooks the letter of 2nd

September 1925 which, though not in evidence, is a document of which the existence is admitted and indeed cannot be denied, in view of the reply that was given to it. The circumstances under which it was written have been deposed to by the plaintiff's witness Taraknath Kundu. That witness said :

I went to the godown of the steamer companies and came away for two or three days as I was informed that the articles had not arrived. Then, on 2nd September 1925, Dwarkanath Sen, godown clerk, informed me that the goods were stolen On 2nd September 1925 we wrote letter to Barisal agent.

Section 10 of the Act provides that no suit shall be instituted against a common carrier for the loss of or injury to goods entrusted to him for carriage unless notice in writing of the loss or injury has been given to him before the institution of the suit and within six months of the time when the loss or injury first came to the knowledge of the plaintiff. If the information that the godown clerk gave was definite enough it stands to reason to assume that the letter must have conveyed similar information. The letter, therefore, may well be treated as the requisite notice and it was given well within time. The defendants have produced the pleader's letter of the 1st April 1926 but not the letter of the 2nd September 1925. The presumption is that if produced it would have gone against them, that is to say, it would have appeared that it amounted to a notice of the loss of the goods. If, on the other hand, the information given by the godown clerk was indefinite, and if, therefore, there was no mention made of the loss in the letter of 2nd September 1925 the pleader's letter of 1st April 1926 was such a notice having made mention of "the said lost goods," "Khulna godown theft case" and "Jagannath Ghat to Kulna Ghat Invoice No. 1935 of 1925, dated 15th August 1925, though this letter was dated 1st April 1926, yet it must be regarded as within time as it was within the peculiar knowledge of the companies themselves as to when the loss took place, Radhasyam Basak v. Secretary of State (1), Jugal Kishor v. G. I. P. Ry. Co. (2), G. I. P. Ry. v. Radhemal (3), and they have failed to discharge the onus that lay on them in respect of it, and also in view of the well-recognized principle of suppressed fraud, a principle which will be more fully referred to in dealing with the question of limitation.

Both the letters were addressed to the joint agents of the two Companies at Barisal, one of them is on the record and shows that it was so addressed, the other one must also have been similarly addressed as it was the joint agents of the "Barisal Agency" who acknowledged receipt of it. Reference has been made to condition No. 18 on the back of the forwarding note which runs in these words :

No claim of any kind whatsoever in respect of this contract shall be valid unless in writing and delivered at the office of the company in Calcutta within six months from the date of any default, loss or damage in respect of which such claim arises.

It is urged on the basis of this condition that the notices, such as they were, were not in compliance with this condition and accordingly the plaintiff's claim is not maintainable. To deal with this contention in order to clear up the ground, it should be pointed out that while S. 10 of the Act requires notice of the loss or injury to be given, condition No. 18 speaks of the notice of any claim under the contract.

It has, however, not been argued that the notice of the claim that has to be lodged under this condition is any different from the notice of the loss or injury contemplated by S. 10 of the Act. If the condition were relied on in that way it would obviously have to be held to be a term in the contract by which the defendants, who are common carriers and insurers of goods, have attempted to contract themselves out of their liability for negligence and imposed upon the insured a disability to recover beyond what the statute has provided for and has made an inroad upon the general law by engrafting on it a limitation that a legal liability which has arisen cannot be enforced in a Court without a demand being made on the party himself. What, however, has been argued is that the notice that was served in this case not having been delivered in "the office of the company in Calcutta, the condition has been violated and accordingly the claim is not maintainable. For companies which have such extensive business at numerous stations and on riverine routes extending all over the provinces of Bengal, Behar and Assam, a condition like this, fairly interpreted, is not at all unreasonable, for, if it is complied with, the companies may at once be put on enquiry as to the loss or injury that has occurred. Moreover, there may be cases in which a servant or agent, service on whom of a notice meant for the companies would ordinarily be sufficient as service on the companies themselves, may be the very person responsible for the loss; in which case want of actual knowledge on the part of the companies would result in no proper investigation being held at all. That it is not an unreasonable condition was held in British India Steam Navigation Co. Ltd. v. Hazi Mahommed Esack and Company (4). The learned Judges who decided the case of the River Steam Navigation Co. v. Hazari Mull (5), also expressed the same view though the dictum laid down therein was obiter in view of what was actually decided.

The case of India General Navigation and Ry. Co. v. Girdhari Lal Gobardhan Das (6), in my opinion, has not actually decided this question. It is, unfortunately, however, that there is in existence nothing answering to the description of "the office of the company at Calcutta." The offices of the agents or managing agents of the two companies are located at two different places in Calcutta. But it is argued that by reason of condition No. 1, of the forwarding note, which is in the nature of an interpretation clause, the "Company" in this case should be read in the plural as meaning the two companies separately and, therefore, condition No. 18 should be read as meaning that two notices will have to be delivered, one at each of the two offices in Calcutta. Such a condition by itself is again not unreasonable, but if this is what was meant it should have been more clearly stated. Merely because the word "company" has to be read in the plural, by virtue of condition No. 1, there is no obligation to read the word "office" in the plural as well. There is nothing to prevent the two companies although they may have their registered offices at two different places from having one joint office in Calcutta for the purpose of these notices, and there is nothing else to prevent the term being more definitely specified in the conditions.

The object of the condition is to do away with the presumption of knowledge from constructive notice arising out of the actual notice served on an agent. To that extent it is a reasonable condition, but beyond that it cannot reasonably go. It cannot be said that if the notice in writing is delivered to an agent and the agent in his turn delivers it to the office of the company in Calcutta it will not be a sufficient compliance of the condition. In Story on Agency para. 140, it is said:

Upon a similar ground notice of facts to an agent is constructive notice thereof to the principal himself where it arises from, or is at the time connected with the subject-matter of his agency for, upon general principles of public policy, it is presumed that the agent has communicated such facts to the principal and if he has not, still the principal having entrusted the agent with the particular business the other party has a right to deem his acts and knowledge obligatory upon the principal, otherwise the neglect of the agent, whether designed or undesigned might operate most injuriously to the rights and interests of such party.

It is quite open to the parties to a contract to stipulate that this presumption which arises upon general principles of public policy should not arise in any particular case, and that the notice instead of being served on an agent would have to be served on the principal himself. This stipulation viewed in a proper light would mean that express notice is given of the limitation of the agent's authority, and if with such knowledge a party chooses to deal with the agent and not with the principal he does so at his own peril. The question is: Do the circumstances of the present case suggest that the contracting parties were ad idem that this presumption will not arise? In the first place it must be conceded that there was no express stipulation in the contract that this ordinary presumption founded on public policy will be put aside in regard to all transactions arising out of the contract, and that there is not a word in the conditions suggesting that the authorities of the companies such as they are in any way restricted in the matter of receiving notices of claim or loss. The companies admittedly have an agency at Barisal. It is named the Barisal Agency as appears from the letter dated 5th September 1925, and the agents there style themselves as joint agents. It is not pretended that the agency is a special agency in the sense that there was delegation of authority to do a single act; it is a general agency which implies a delegation to do all acts connected with a particular trade, business or employment. In connexion with such agencies the principles to be borne in mind are well set out in Story on Agency para 127.

If a person is held out to third parties or to the public at large, by the principal, as having a general authority to act for and to bind him in a particular business or employment, it would be the height of injustice and lead to the grossest frauds, to allow him to set up his own secret and private instructions to the agent, limiting his authority; and thus to defeat his acts and transactions under the agency when the party dealing with him had, and could have, no notice of such instructions. In such cases good faith requires that the principal should be held bound by the acts of the agent, within the scope of his general authority; for he has held him out to the public as competent to do the acts and to bind him thereby. The maxim of natural justice here applies with its full force, that he, who without intentional fraud has enabled any person to do an act, which must be injurious to another innocent party, shall himself suffer the injury rather than the innocent party, who has confidence in him. The maxim is founded on the soundest ethics and is enforced to a large extent by Courts of equity.

As has been tersely put by an American Judge of great eminence:

The question in such cases is not so much what authority the agent had in point of fact, as it is what powers third parties had a right to suppose he possessed, judging from his acts and the acts of his principals.

Here the joint agents received the plaintiff's letter and in reply informed him that the matter was under enquiry and promised to intimate the result to him in due course. In sending the reply they purported to act as joint agents of the two companies in respect of the Barisal Agency. Applying the principles referred to above it irresistibly follows that the plaintiff must have understood that the notice to the Barisal agents was sufficient to discharge the burden that lay on him under S. 10, Carriers Act. Was he to assume that the notice which he had thus given would not be communicated to the principals at Calcutta? Knowledge acquired by the principals from their agents under such circumstances would not be knowledge acquired aliunde, but from the source of its emanation, namely, the notice in writing. The defendants have nowhere said that they did not receive either of these two letters or that they did not receive them in time, and in the absence of any such express averments the ordinary presumption must be given effect to. There is no indication, that the companies ever restricted the powers of their agents in the matter of dealing with claims; and even if it be assumed that there were any such restriction the conduct of the agents in accepting the notices amounted to a representation by which the companies are bound.

The second ground on which the decision has been attacked is on the question of limitation. It is now well-settled that all suits against carriers in respect of goods delivered to them for carriage fall under Art. 30 or Art. 31, Lim. Act: Chiranji Lal Ramlal v. B. N. Ry. Co. Ltd. (7), Hazi Azam v. Bombay and Persian Steam Navigation Co. (8), G. I. P. Ry. v. Ganpat Rai (9), Mutsaddi Lal v. B. B. & C. I. Ry. Co. (10), Venkatasubbarow v. Asiatic Steam Navigation Co. (11). The action against the common carrier for non-delivery of goods is founded on contract because the relationship between the parties commences in contract, but it is an action in tort because the cause of action is the breach of duty of the carrier. The view of Chatterjee, J., in Radha Shyam Basak v. Secretary of State (1), that where there is a breach of the written contract Art. 115 applies and not Art. 31, can no longer be regarded as sound. If Art. 115 be held to apply, mere non-delivery was no proof of loss and the onus of proving as an affirmative fact that the non-delivery was due to loss or to some tortuous act of theirs, which would make the shorter period of limitation apply, lay on them: Mohan Singh v. Henry Couder (12), British India Steam Navigation Co. v. Hazi Mohamed Eshak & Co. (4), Danmul v. British India Steam Navigation Co. (13). But in this they have failed, upon the finding of the learned Judge. In my view, the article applicable is 30 or 31 accordingly as the claim is regarded as one based upon loss of or injury to the goods or of non-delivery thereof. Taking it either way the suit in my opinion was within time. Treated as a suit to which Art. 30 would apply, the onus of proving that the loss took place more than a year before suit and, therefore, that the suit was barred under Art. 30, would lie on the defendants: Radha Shyam Basak v. Secretary of State (1), Jugal Kishore v. G. I. P. Ry. Co. (2), G. I. P. Ry. Co. v. Radhemal (3). Moreover, a case of this nature would, in my opinion, attract the doctrine of concealed fraud. Of this doctrine, it is thus said in Pollock on Torts, 10th Edn. p. 220

The operation of the statute of limitation is further subject to the exception of concealed fraud derived from the doctrine and practice of the Court of Chancery which, whether it thought itself barred by the terms of the statute or only acted in analogy to it, considerably modified its literal application. 'Where a wrong doer fraudulently conceals his own wrong, the period of limitation runs from the time when the plaintiff discovers the truth or with reasonable diligence would discover it. Such is now the rule of the Supreme Court in every branch of it and in all causes. The same rule holds if the defendant has not actively concealed the fraud, but the plaintiff has been ignorant of it without any fault of his own.'

For this last statement the authority cited is Oelkers v. Ellis (14). Regarded as a suit to which Art. 31, would apply, there having been no time fixed for delivery and there having at no time been any refusal to deliver, but, on the other hand by the letter of 5th September 1925 the companies having informed the plaintiff that the matter was being enquired into, the plaint filed on 28th August 1926 was well within time: Jugal Kishore v. G. I. P. Ry. Co. (2). As pointed out in this last-mentioned case an inflexible rule, that time begins to run from the expiry of the ordinary period of transit, need not be recognized.

The third point urged on behalf of the defendants is on the question of their liability. Under the Carriers Act the loss or damage of goods delivered for carriage to a common carrier is prima facie evidence of negligence and the burden to disprove negligence lies on the carrier; and loss from an unknown cause is presumptive proof of negligence: Chout- mull v. Rivers Steam Navigation Co. (15) affirmed on appeal by the Judicial Committee in Rivers Steam Navigation Co. v. Choutmull (16). The story of the theft having been entirely disbelieved, the defendants have not explained how the loss occurred. They have, therefore, failed to discharge the burden that lay on them. Some argument has been advanced before me to show that, the story of theft should have been believed. This, however, is a question of fact into which I would decline to enter in view of the very clear and strong finding of the Court below.

The fourth and last argument relates to the amount of the decree. So far as this argument is concerned, I do not find any materials on which a decree for damages may be passed. The allegation which forms the foundation of this part of the claim has not been proved and the learned Judge has not given any substantial reason for its sustenance. This part of the decree therefore, will have to be set aside.

The result then is that the rule should be discharged, subject to the modification that the decree for claim with costs will be reduced by Rs. 31 and will be for Rs. 418-8-9. For this small success the petitioners will be absolved from payment of the costs of the opposite party in this rule, it being ordered that each party will bear his or their own costs therein.

Judgment.—This appeal arises out of a suit for khas possession of some land on establishment of the plaintiff's title thereto. The allegations on which the plaintiff brought the suit were that he had obtained settlement of the land from two persons, Kanai and Dwijabar, by a patta in the year 1327 B. S. and that after he was in possession of the land for some time he was dispossessed by the defendants in the year 1330 B. S. The defence inter alia was that as Kanai and Dwijabar's interest in the land was that of a raiyat only the patta obtained by the plaintiff was void under the provisions of S. 85, Ben. Ten. Act, and that the defendants themselves had obtained a lease of the land from the widows of Kanai and Dwijabar in the year 1330 B. S. Both the lower Courts held in favour of the plaintiff and gave him a decree. The defendants have appealed to this Court.

It appears that the plaintiff as well as the defendants claimed the land in suit under registered leases in contravention of S. 85, Ben. Ten. Act, and the contention of the learned vakil for the appellants was that, that being so, the plaintiff could not succeed in ejectment against the defendants who were in the advantageous position of a defendant in possession. And in support of this contention he placed reliance on the cases of Telam Pramanik v Adu Shaikh (1) and Jarip Khan v. Dorfa Bewa (2). On behalf of the respondents reliance was placed on the decisions in Gour Mondal v. Peari Maghi (3), Ganesh Mandal v. Thanda Namasundrani (4) and Nibaran

Chandra Mirdha v. Ram Charan Mondal (5). The question for determination, therefore, is which of these two sets of rulings should be applicable to the facts in the present case. The learned vakil for the appellants urged that the present case would fall within the decision in Garip Khan v. Dorfa Bewa (2), inasmuch as the plaintiff based his case on the patta of the year 1327 B. S., which was inadmissible in evidence. I am unable to agree with the learned vakil in this view of the matter. The plaintiff did not base his case on the patta alone, but his case was—and this is also the finding of the learned District Judge—that he was in possession of the land as well. As has been pointed out by Fletcher, J. in Ganesh Mandal v. Thanda Namasundrani (4), where a tenant cannot or does not produce his lease in writing, he can never theless, establish his tenancy from possession and other circumstances. The present case, therefore, in my opinion, does not fall within the decision of the case reported in Garip Khan v. Dorfa Bewa (2), but falls within the decision of Manik Borai v. Bani Charan Mandal (6). In the case of Gour Mondal v. Balaram Manji (3), it has been held that although an under-raiyat's lease is in excess of what a raiyat is entitled to grant to an under-raiyat under the provisions of S. 85, Ben. Ten. Act, yet, if the under-raiyat was in possession of the property on the basis of the kabuliyat he has sufficient interest in the property to recover the land. On the authority, therefore, of the cases in Ganesh Mandal v. Thanda Namasundrani (4), Nibaran Chandra v. Ram Charan Mondal (5), Gour Mondal v. Peary Majhi (3), I hold that the plaintiff in the present case was entitled to a decree.

The present appeal, therefore, in my opinion, fails and must be dismissed with costs. There has been an application for leave to appeal under S. 15, Letters Patent. The application is allowed as I consider the case to be a fit one for such an appeal.

RANKIN, C. J., AND MITTER, J.

Chuni Lal Mandal—Defendant—Appellant.

v.

Hira Lal Mandal and another—Plaintiffs—Respondents.

Appeal No. 5 of 1927, Decided on 4th July 1927, from original order of Chotzner, J., D/- 22nd January 1927.

Civil P. C., Sch. 2, para. 1—Suit for partition—Reference to private arbitration on counsel's motion—Consent decree passed—Party objecting—Power of counsel limited—Decree must be set aside.

In a suit for partition, on the motion of the counsel of the parties, a particular person was appointed as a special referee to go into accounts and a consent decree was passed fixing the shares of the parties. Thereupon one of the parties moved the Court to set aside the decree on the ground that the counsel consented to arbitration contrary to his instructions. The Court found that the counsel had limited authority and proceeded with the case.

Held : that if a client objected to important matters of account being referred to private arbitration and to a private referee, and if that was done by mistake of his counsel, the Court was not wrong in taking steps to see that the suit should proceed in the ordinary way: Neale v. Gordon Lennox, (1902) 1 A.C. 465, Foll. [P 380 C 2]

N. C. Chatterjee—for Appellant.

J. N. Majumdar and A. Dutt—for Respondents.

The order appealed from was as follows:

Chotzner, J.—This is an application to vacate a decree made by this Court by consent of parties on 15th December 1926.

The parties to the litigation are related to each other as sons and mother, the plaintiff and defendant 1 being sons and defendant 2 being the mother.

After the case had been opened and one witness was being examined certain terms were put in by Mr. Roy who appeared for defendant 1 and these were accepted by Mr. Ghose for the plaintiff and by Mr. Mitter for defendant 2, though it does not appear that any of the learned counsel actually signed the proposed terms. Thereupon an order was made by consent embodying the terms recorded, giving the parties liberty to apply during the enquiry which was to be held by Mr. H. K. Mitter, Bar-at-Law. On the following day Mr. Mitter informed the Court that his client Nistarini Dassi was not prepared to accept the terms embodied in the agreement. Notice was thereupon given to the other two learned counsel and the matter was heard upon affidavit.

Mr. Mitter informed the Court from his place at the Bar that, in consenting to the terms proposed, he was acting under a misapprehension as to the extent of the rights which his client had conferred upon him. He was not clear at the time when he consented that any restrictions had been put upon them and, therefore, he did not consider himself justified in maintaining the position he had taken in regard to the agreement.

Learned counsel, on the other side, have argued that learned counsel acting on behalf of their clients have complete authority to deal with all matters arising in the course of a trial and to dispose of them in their client's interest to the best of their knowledge and ability.

It is, I think, a well-established principle that learned counsel is vested with full authority to deal with all matters in his control relating to and affecting the interests of his client. Cases may arise and have arisen, as in the case of Neal v. Gordon Lennox (1), where learned counsel went beyond the powers that had been given to him and it was there pointed out that when learned counsel exceeded his authority the Court would not ratify it.

Now, there can be no question here that when he accepted the terms of settlement Mr. Mitter was acting under the impression that he had full powers to deal with all matters connected with the present litigation. He now states from his place at the Bar that that impression was mistaken and that his client had not vested him with an absolute but with only restricted authority, and he is supported herein by an affidavit filed by the lady herself and by another affidavit filed by her solicitor, and I have no hesitation in accepting his statement. I should personally have thought that no great injustice was being done to the lady if she had consented to the terms proposed but, as apparently, she feels it a grievance that the matters should be concluded upon the lines indicated, I am opinion that the settlement decree should be vacated.

I think, in the circumstances, it is only fair to the other two parties that the lady should pay the costs of the application and of the hearing.

The case will be restored and will be placed at the head of the list on 10th January 1927, subject to any part-heard case.

[On appeal the following judgment was delivered:]

Rankin, C. J.—In this case defendant Chuni Lal Mandal complains of an order made by Mr. Justice Chotzner whereby he set aside an order previously made by him, the effect of which was to declare certain shares of parties by consent in a partition suit, to appoint Mr. H. K. Mitter, Barrister-at-Law to partition a certain estate and to direct Mr. H. K. Mitter to take certain accounts and to make certain enquiries.

There were three parties to this suit: two brothers and their mother. The mother is said to be siding with the plaintiff Hira Lal and there appear to have been great many steps in the various disputes in which these parties unfortunately seem to have taken part one against the other. We are not at the moment concerned with anything which happened prior to the date the 15th December 1926, when this partition suit came on for hearing. It seems to be a suit in which both parties were liable to account as having various intromissions with the estate left by the father. Defendant Chuni Lal's case was that there was a large quantity of money and valuables in a certain iron safe in the house where Hira Lal and his mother lived and he was desirous of establishing that he was entitled to a certain share of these. In these circumstances, when the suit came on for hearing before Mr. Justice Chotzner, the first thing which happened was that the plaintiff was called on his own behalf as a witness and it was while the plaintiff's evidence was being taken that the incident happened with which we are now concerned.

That the issues which were settled by the learned Judge were fairly complicated there can be no doubt, and the question of the amount of money that was to go to the brothers and to the mother involved accounts and enquiries of a somewhat difficult character. Mr. A. K. Roy, who appeared for Chuni Lal, took the point that it was waste of time before the learned Judge to go into evidence on the part of the plaintiff or anybody else as to the various details of the accounts as it was quite obvious that in this case there would have to be an order directing the taking of accounts, and accordingly he suggested that a Court officer should be appointed. Somebody else suggested that a particular named advocate, Mr. H. K. Mitter, should be appointed, the intention being that he would act as commissioner of partition and also as the person to whom the accounts and enquiries should be referred; in other words, he should be appointed as a special referee. In the end what happened was that Mr. J. N. Mitter, the learned counsel who appeared for the mother, accepted the suggestion that Mr. H. K. Mitter should be appointed and Mr. Mitter was appointed accordingly as appears from the consent decree passed by the Court.

That decree having been made, purporting to be a consent decree, the lady moved the learned Judge to set that aside. She made the case that she had given certain specific instructions to her attorney who had passed them on to her counsel. These instructions were directed to the question whether an arbitration or a reference to some person other than an officer of the Court should be agreed to. It may be mentioned that the parties had had previous experience of disputes being referred to arbitration and that it had been disastrous. Her case was that she had given express instructions that certain things were not to be referred in any way and she gave evidence to that effect herself. She filed an affidavit and her solicitor also filed an affidavit to the effect that he had specific instructions not to consent to any private arbitration or reference to any private individual of matters in dispute in the suit without getting tried by the Court certain questions, and further not to consent until another suit in which his client was the plaintiff was agreed to be tried along with the present suit, and all charges made against her by Chuni Lal Mandal in his written statement and by his counsel in her cross-examination were withdrawn.

Now, it is quite true, as Mr. Chatterji, in a very careful and able argument before us has pointed out, that at first sight a good deal of suspicion attaches to a story of this sort. That suspicion is not lessened by the fact that the attorney's affidavit does not give any dates. But the matter does not stop there because the learned Judge, at the time when he considered the lady's application to set aside the previous decree, had before him Mr. Mitter, the learned counsel who had consented on behalf of the lady. Mr. Mitter informed the Court from his place at the Bar that in consenting to the terms proposed he was under a misapprehension as to the authority which had been conferred upon him by his client. He said that he was acting under the impression that he had full power to deal with all matters connected with the present litigation but that that impression was mistaken and he had only a restricted authority. In these circumstances, the learned Judge has acted upon the basis that this story of limited authority of the learned counsel is a true story. I am not prepared to reverse that finding.

The main argument of Mr. Chatterji before us has been upon the principle which is to be found in certain cases which he has cited, that if special restriction is put upon the general and apparent authority of a counsel to effect a settlement of matters in a suit, that restriction will not be binding on the other side unless it is communicated to him; in other words, every person is entitled to presume, till it is said to the contrary that learned counsel has a general authority. For that proposition certain cases have been cited to us. Strass v. Francis (2) reaffirmed in the case of Welsh v. Roe (3) and the Calcutta case of Asharam Choutmal v. E. I. Ry. Co. (3) decided by my learned brother Mr. Justice Page. On the other hand, we have to consider the case in the House of Lords, the well-known case of Neale v. Gordon Lennox (4).

The first thing we have to ask ourselves here is what was the nature of this order. In so far as it is complained of it is complained of because it is an order referring to a private individual—an advocate of this Court—certain matters of account which were involved in the suit itself. It may be perfectly in the right of the learned Judge to refer matters of account to an officer of Court or to somebody else if he thinks it necessary; but in this particular case the reference was, by consent, to a particular named individual, and in these circumstances we have to consider whether the learned Judge was right in being satisfied that the reference in all these matters of account to this particular individual by consent was a reference which should stand after it had been discovered that the learned counsel who had consented to it had done so contrary to his client's instructions. I do not want to put this case on its facts too high, and I do not think that it can be put as high as the case of Neale v. Gordon Lennox from the point of view of the interest of the lady client. This is not a case in which the aspersions upon the lady's character were a very prominent feature of the suit. It is not a case in which it would be at all unreasonable for the lady to agree to the proposition put forward as, indeed, the learned Judge thinks.

But, on the other hand, if it is really true that the lady had objected to these important matters of account (from her point of view) being referred to private arbitration and to a private referee, and if that was done by mistake of her counsel, I am not prepared to hold that the learned Judge was wrong in taking steps to see that the suit should proceed in the ordinary way. If any order of reference can be made without the lady's consent it can still be made notwithstanding that this appeal is dismissed. I say nothing whatever upon that aspect of the case. I do not think that there was any lack of jurisdiction on the part of the learned Judge to make the order which he has made. I do not think that it is open in a case of this sort to the appellant Chuni Lal to say that he will hold the other parties to this bargain at all costs whether the Court thinks fit to do so or not. In my judgment the position is that the learned Judge has chosen the better course. He dealt with it as a case of the same essential type as Neale v. Gordon Lennox and it certainly is a case in which the order of reference which the Court has made involves that the Court's assistance is being asked in the sense in which

v.

Emperor—Opposite Party.

Criminal Appeal No. 319 of 1927, Decided on 21st September and 18th November 1927, from order of Chief Presy. Magistrate, Calcutta, D/- 21st April 1927.

(a) Calcutta Suppression of Immoral Traffic Act (13 B. C. of 1923), S. 6—Offence.

Per Graham, Cammiade and Duval, JJ.—Mere letting of rooms to prostitutes or collecting rents from them is not an offence.

(b) Calcutta Suppression of Immoral Traffic Act (13 B. C. of 1923), S. 6—(Graham and Duval, JJ.): Lessee subletting premises to prostitutes, collecting rent daily by sitting outside and actively associating with the business of the brothel—Conviction under S. 6 is proper (Cammiade, J., contra).

The accused took on lease certain houses for the purpose of making a living out of them and sublet the houses to prostitutes and made a fine profit out of them. He was not content with simply collecting his rents once a week or once a month, but he attended there daily and had full control over them. He was also daily sitting outside the houses collecting his rents, at times interviewing visitors, and having men there to assist him.

Held: (Per Graham and Duval, JJ.)—That it was not a case of simply having let out the houses to some women who used them for immoral purposes, but was also a case where the lessee took the houses so as to make a profit out of prostitution and that his conviction under S. 6 was proper.

Per Cammiade, J.—Letting rooms to prostitutes and sitting at the gate of the premises to collect daily rent does not amount to the offence punishable under S. 6.

Graham, J.—This is an appeal by one Kambhoo Bera, who has been convicted by Mr. J.D. Tyson, formerly Chief Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta, under S. 6 of the Calcutta Suppression of Immoral Traffic Act (Bengal Act 13 of 1923), and sentenced to six months' rigorous imprisonment, and to pay a fine of Rs. 1,000, with an additional terms of six months' rigorous imprisonment in the event of default to pay the fine. The case is stated to be the first of its kind and keenly contested before the Magistrate. The section in question reads as follows:

6 (1) Any male person, who knowingly lives, wholly or in part, on the earnings of prostitution, shall be punished with imprisonment, which may extend to three years, or with whipping, or with both of those punishments, and shall also be liable to a fine which may extend to one thousand rupees.

(2) Where a male person is proved: (i) to be living with, or to be habitually in the company of a prostitute, or (ii), to have exercised control, direction, or influence over the movements of a prostitute, in such a manner as to show that he is aiding abetting or compelling her prostitution with any other person, or generally, it shall be presumed, until the contrary is proved, that he is knowingly living on the earnings of prostitution.

The case, as originally set up before the Additional Presidency Magistrate, Mr. Biver, was with special reference to sub-S. (2) of the section and the charge was framed in these terms:

That you Kambhoo Bera, between the first day of August 1925 and the 29th day of July 1926, in the town of Calcutta being a male person knowingly lived wholly, or in part on the earnings of prostitution of several inmates of premises No. 37, Uma Das Lane, Calcutta, to wit, amongst others of Hari Bai, Paro, Chandra Debi, Saroj, Lakshimi and Sashi, by living with or being habitually in the company of the said prostitutes, or having exercised control, direction, or influence over the movements of the said prostitutes in such a manner as to show that you were aiding or compelling their prostitution with other persons generally, and thereby you, the said Kambhoo Bera, committed an offence punishable under S. 6, Cl. (1) Calcutta Suppression of Immoral Traffic Act and within my cognizance.

The learned Chief Presidency Magistrate observed that the charge had been inartistically drawn, that it undertook to prove more than the prosecution had been able to establish, and more than it was presumably ever intended to establish, since there was no case in respect of any of the women save and except, Saroj, and that, as matters stood, he was unable to hold it proved that Kambhoo lived with Saroj. He then went on to record the following findings:

I do not think it is at all proved that Kambhoo lives at 37, Uma Das Lane; the probability is that he lives at 64, Free School Street. . . . I am satisfied that he goes to Uma Das Lane and sits at the gates of the brothel at nights, and that he takes a hand in the proceedings there, and even accepts money, though

I do not think it is satisfactorily proved what money it is that he takes. There is evidence that his men bring visitors; this, coupled with his evident desire to get Chandra back when she ran away indicates an exercise of control in such a way as to suggest that he was aiding and even compelling to prostitution. The evidence on these points is, however, not conclusive, and I am not prepared to raise the presumption permitted by sub S. (2) of S. 6.

The learned Magistrate then goes on to comment upon the fact that the house in question and two others, so far from being let out by the accused at a loss, as contended by the defence, were let at exorbitant rents, and observes that the accused belongs to that class of men which relieves landlords of the troubles arising from the refusal of the civil Courts to grant decrees in enforcement of immoral contracts. He goes on to say:

We find Kambhoo giving his time and attention to this, going at night and sitting at the gate: and we find him taking pains to report when one of his tenants is missing; and we find further that she disappears mysteriously from the house of her benefactor and is traced again to the brothel of the man from whom she has just run away, and against whom she has just applied for police warning.

The question is, says the Magistrate, whether such a finding brings the accused within the purview of S. 6 of the Act, and his final conclusion is that it does, and he accordingly convicted and sentenced him as already stated.

The learned vakil for the appellant stated at the outset that he proposed to argue the appeal on the basis of the findings arrived at in the Court below, and his main contention was that, even if those findings be accepted, they are not sufficient to support a conviction under S. 6 of the Act, and that the mere acceptance of rent from persons known to the lessor to be living as prostitutes is not punishable under the section. He urged that the appellant was living not upon the earnings of prostitution, but upon his rent, and that, when some other fact intervenes, such as the right of a lessee to collect his rent, it cannot be said that he is living on the earnings of prostitution, and that the money taken must be shown to be in some way or other directly connected with the act of prostitution.

The argument is plausible, but, having regard to the particular findings which have been arrived at in this case, it cannot in my opinion avail the appellant. If the finding had been that the accused merely collected his rent daily from these women, whom he knew to be prostitutes, I think it is doubtful if the section would apply. The finding here, however, is more than that. The learned Magistrate has found that the accused used to go at night and sit at the gate. What is the significance to be attached to that fact? It seems to me that the only possible conclusion is that the accused was doing something more than collecting his rent, and that he was actively associating himself with the business of the brothel. The further facts which have been found by the Magistrate in connexion with one of the women who disappeared from the house and was recovered point to the same conclusion. It would be quite unnecessary for the accused to go and sit at the gate at night if his only object in going there was to collect his rent.

In short the evidence, as the learned Magistrate has observed towards the end of his judgment, goes somewhat further than the bare case raised by the defence, and having regard to the findings on that evidence I am of opinion that it has been proved that the accused was in part at all events living on the earnings of prostitution and that he is liable to the penalty provided in S. 6 of the Act.

In my judgment the appeal should be dismissed and the conviction and sentence upheld.

Cammiade, J.—The appellant has been convicted by the Chief Presidency Magistrate of an offence under S. 6, Calcutta Suppression of Immoral Traffic Act, Act 13 B. C. of 1923, and has been sentenced to undergo rigorous imprisonment for six months and to pay a fine of Rs. 1,000. In default of payment of the fine he has been sentenced to a further term of rigorous imprisonment for six months.

The appellant is admittedly the tenant of three sets of premises, Nos. 26B, 37 and 38, Uma Das Lane; and he admittedly sublets these premises to prostitutes. He is also the tenant of 64, Free School Street, which is occupied by male subtenants. In order to substantiate the charge against the petitioner, a variety of allegations were made at the trial, and practically all of these have been disbelieved by the learned Magistrate. These various allegations and the learned Magistrate's findings on them are as follows:

It was alleged that a prostitute by the name of Chandra had been brought to Calcutta by a man who carries on such traffic and had been sold to the appellant, who had forced her to practice prostitution against her will and had appropriated her earnings, and that the appellant had similarly taken the earnings of other prostitutes living in his houses and that he shared the earnings of others. It was further alleged that the remuneration to be paid to prostitutes was settled at the gate of the premises, where admittedly the appellant sits every evening, and that the remuneration is paid by the visitors into the appellant's hands. It was further alleged that the appellant lived at 37, Uma Das Lane, with the prostitutes.

The learned Magistrate has disbelieved all the above allegations. He has held that it has not been proved that the appellant lives at 37, Uma Das Lane and that the probability is that he lives at 64, Free School Street. He states that there is no evidence that Chandra was sold to the appellant, and that it has not been proved that the appellant lives with any of the prostitutes named in the charge. He further states that, though the appellant sits at the gate of the premises and receives money, it has not been satisfactorily proved what money it is that he takes.

The learned Magistrate further mentions that there is the evidence of one witness, witness 4, for the prosecution, to the effect that the appellant's men bring visitors to the prostitutes. His comment on this evidence and also on the evidence relating to a report made by the appellant to the police against Chandra is as follows:

The evidence on these points is, however, not conclusive; and I am not prepared to raise the presumption permitted by sub-S. 2 of S. 6.

The learned Magistrate sums up his findings in the following passages:

Briefly, then, the position is that Kambhoo is one of that class of men who relieve landlords of the troubles arising from the refusal of the civil Courts to grant decrees in enforcement of immoral contracts.

On the defence case, therefore, I think that Kambhoo is liable to punishment under S. 6; and the evidence, as I have shown, goes somewhat further than the bare case raised by the defence.

It is sufficient, it seems to me, for the prosecution to show that part of the income of the accused is to his knowledge derived from prostitution.

According to the learned Magistrate the facts he finds against the appellant are that he lets rooms to prostitutes and sits at the gate of the premises at nights to realize his rents, which are payable daily. As regards two of the allegations made against the appellant, namely that men of his bring visitors to the prostitutes and that the woman, Chandra, was compelled to return to the appellant's house after she had run away from there, the learned Magistrate has said that the evidence is not conclusive. He does not say what it is not conclusive of; but, judging from the words that immediately follow, one must conclude that the learned Magistrate intended to state that the evidence was not fully satisfactory, because, he says:

I am not prepared to raise the presumption permitted by sub-S. (2) to S. 6.

In Cl. 2 to sub-S. 2 of S. 6 we find that where a person is proved to have exercised control, direction or influence over the movements of a prostitute, in such a manner as to show that he is aiding, abetting or compelling her prostitution with any other person or generally, it shall be presumed, until the contrary is proved, that he is knowingly living on the earnings of prostitution.

The fact that the learned Magistrate holds that the evidence given before him does not raise this presumption clearly leads to the conclusion that the learned Magistrate did not believe the evidence. Had he believed the evidence, the presumption would clearly arise. Had the appellant compelled Chandra to return to his premises to carry on prostitution or were it true that the appellant had been proved to have brokers who brought visitors to the prostitutes living on his premises, his case would clearly fall within the terms of the rule laid down in sub-S. (2).

The question, therefore, now arising is whether the facts found, namely that the appellant lets rooms to prostitutes and sits at the gate of the premises to collect his daily rent, amount to the offence made punishable by S. 6 of the Act.

The section reads as follows :

Any male person who knowingly lives, wholly or in part, on the earnings of prostitution shall be punished with imprisonment, &c.

It will be noticed that the section applies exclusively to male persons; and this fact alone must make it clear that mere letting of rooms to prostitutes is not made an offence. Had the intention of the legislature been to make such letting of rooms punishable there is no reason why women should not be made punishable for doing the same thing.

The Act does not put the unfortunate women who live by prostitution outside the pale of the law and prohibit their living-in rented houses or rooms. If we look at S. 3 of the Act, we find that the letting of houses and rooms to prostitutes is distinctly and expressly contemplated by the Act; and since that is so, earning of money by letting houses or rooms to prostitutes cannot by itself amount to living, wholly or in part, on the earnings of prostitution. If there were any substance in the contrary view every person who sold anything to a prostitute—a seer of rice or a packet of cigarettes—knowing that the woman was a prostitute would be living in part on the earnings of prostitution.

The only question remaining to be considered is whether or not the fact that the appellant sits at the gate of the premises at nights to collect his rent brings his case within the purview of the section. The learned Magistrate has found that the presumption laid down by sub-S. (2) does not arise. The first clause of this sub-section raises the presumption where a male person is proved to be living with, or to be habitually in the company of a prostitute. He has also found that the appellant collects nothing more than his rent, which is paid to him by the prostitutes after they have been visited. In these circumstances, however loathsome the appellant's calling may be, it is impossible to see how it can amount to an offence under the section.

I would, therefore, allow the appeal and set aside the conviction and sentence.

Duval, J.—In this case one Kambhoo Bera was put on his trial under S. 6, Calcutta Suppression of Immoral Traffic Act, before the Chief Presidency Magistrate and was convicted by him and sentenced to six months' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of one thousand rupees, in default, a further six months' rigorous imprisonment. The charge against him was that he was living wholly, or in part, on the earnings of prostitution of seven inmates of a certain premises No. 37, Umadas's Lane, Calcutta, and in support of that charge a large amount of evidence was adduced which may shortly be divided into three main heads: the evidence of prostitutes living in the house itself a large body of evidence of local neighbours as to what was going on at the premises and the evidence of the landlords of three houses which were let out to the accused. The Chief Presidency Magistrate was unable to accept as good a large number of the statements made by the prostitutes and cast doubts on some of the other evidence as he considered that it might have been brought owing to ill feeling between the accused and some of the witnesses. But he did come to certain findings and in the hearing before me most of these findings are not contested. The admitted facts are that there are three houses in Umadas's Lane, Nos. 37, 38 and 26 (b), all of which are inhabited by prostitutes and apparently have been so inhabited for a long time, that the accused has taken leases of these three houses from their respective landlords and is personally collecting the rents daily from the unfortunates living therein. It is also in evidence that he pays rent to the landlord, Rs. 125 in respect of house No. 37. We have no evidence as to what rent he actually pays for the house No. 38 and as to house No. 26 (b) the evidence is that he only took it about a month before this prosecution was launched at a rental of Rs. 210. The landlord of premises No. 37 admits that he has let it out knowing it to be used by prostitutes so as not to have trouble of collecting rents himself and this appears to be the case in respect of the other two houses. Now as to this, the evidence also goes to show that he charges daily rent from these women and he goes regularly down this street though his residence is in another rented house a little way away and personally sees to the collection of rents. There is also evidence to show that his men are also engaged in seeing the people who visit these women and there is a further fact that he charges Re. 1-4-0 a day or so rent from each of the women, and on any calculation this must give him a large profit in respect of three houses.

We are concerned, however, only with house No. 37, in which six or seven women are said to live and even that house must bring in to him a considerable amount of profit per month. There is, therefore, evidence that he does make a fine profit by having taken lease of premises No. 37 and by collecting rent from the women living there. There is also evidence that he personally goes there and sees to the collection of rent daily and his men also interview visitors. There is also some evidence that at times he interviews visitors himself and the evidence is that the women receive payments from the visitors and, after they are paid, hand the rents over to him. Now the question arises whether these facts, which I find from the evidence fully established, show that an offence under S. 6 of the Act has been committed. The mere payment of rent by a prostitute to a landlord would not in my opinion bring the case (as the Chief Presidency Magistrate appears to have thought) within the mischief of the section. A prostitute must find somewhere to live, whatever her occupation may be and; however she earns her money, and there are cases in England to show that the landlord cannot be convicted in respect of the keeping of a brothel which in England is illegal, because he only derives profit by taking a high rate of rent. I may refer specially to the case of Reg V. Samuel Stannard (1). But that case, on its own facts, is very different from the present case. In that case the landlord had no control over any inmates of the house though no doubt he let it out to people for immoral purposes, and, therefore, he had no right to decide as to who was to be admitted and who not into the house. Here the case is very different. Here the evidence goes to show that he took these three houses for the purpose of making a living out of them and the evidence shows that he makes a fine profit out of them. He also is not content with simply collecting his rents once a week or once a month, but he attends there daily and has full control over them. The oral evidence of the neighbours shows that he is also daily sitting outside the houses, collecting his rents, at times interviewing visitors, and having men there to assist him and, in my opinion, this is not a case of simply having let out the houses to some women who used them for immoral purposes, but is also a case where the lessee has taken the houses so as to make a profit out of prostitution and is making a profit by the interest and control that he is still exercising over the women and over the premises in question.

In this view I hold that the Chief Presidency Magistrate has rightly convicted the accused and, therefore, I uphold the sentence and conviction.

Appeal No. 4 of 1927, Decided on 14th November 1927, from original decree of Chotzner, J., D/- 16th November 1926.

(a) Registration Act (16 of 1908), S. 21—Mortgage of several immovable properties—Inaccurate description of one property invalidates the whole deed.

A house and certain land were mortgaged by the same deed. In respect of the land what was sought to be mortgaged was merely the tenants' permanent interest but the mortgagor had no tenants' interest in that land and, moreover, the description given of the said land was inaccurate in every particular.

Held: that the subject-matter of the mortgage had not been identified at all for the purposes of registration within the meaning of S. 21 and the document even if registered would not be valid. [P 386 C 2, P 387 C 1]

(b) Word—"Kayemi" does not connote zamindari interest in land by any person—It means "a permanent occupancy holding."

The word "kayemi" is never used in describing zamindari interest in land by any person. The word is always used in connexion with the description of tenants' rights in land and it "means a permanent occupancy holding."

Langford James, S. C. Basu and J. N. Mazumdar—for Appellants.

N. N. Sircar and P. N. Chatterjee—for Respondents.

C. C. Ghose, J.—This appeal must be dismissed and for the following reasons. The appeal arises out of an action brought by the plaintiff firm for a declaration that a certain Indenture of Conveyance executed in their favour, on 8th December 1921, by the first five defendants gives them an absolute right of ownership in the entirety of premises No. 187, Durmahatta Street, free from encumbrances, and for a further declaration that a certain mortgage executed on 25th June 1921, by the said defendants in favour of the firm of Nahar Lal Shah

Parnesswar Doyal Shah, who hereinafter called defendant 6. is null and void and for an order for cancellation thereof and for delivery of the said mortgage-deed and of vacant possession of a certain go-down and stable in premises No. 187, Darmahatta Street, at present occupied by defendant 6. There is a further claim for mesne profits at the rate of Rs. 300 per month from the date of conveyance.

The first five defendants did not appear to contest the suit, but the suit was resisted by defendant 6 alone. Mr. Justice Chotzner, before whom the suit came on for trial, found, on the facts as disclosed in the evidence in this case, that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed and he accordingly made the declarations asked for. The plaintiff's case was that, if the one cotta of land as described in the mortgage-deed of 25th June 1921 was not in existence and could not be identified, the registration at Arrah of the deed which included the Calcutta property referred to above was invalid.

In the written statement which was filed the contentions put forward were: first, that the mortgage of 25th June 1921 was not null and void; and secondly, that the plaintiff could not question the validity of the registration of the mortgage inasmuch as the properties which were the subject of the mortgage were, as a matter of fact, in existence and they had been sufficiently described for the purpose of registration. The plaintiff firm's contention on the other hand was, as indicated above, that there could not have been any registration whatsoever of the document of 25th June 1921, inasmuch as the property, namely, one cotta of land in village Ekona in the district of Arrah, referred to in the document, did not exist, and, even if it did exist, the description thereof was insufficient within the meaning of S. 21, Registration Act.

On appeal before us, the only point that has been urged by Mr. Langford James on behalf of the appellant is that the learned Judge was wrong in coming to the conclusion that the property, namely, the said one cotta of land described as above, did not exist, and further that the plaintiff firm could not possibly challenge the validity of registration of the document on the ground of non-description or insufficient description of the said property.

Now, it appears to me, on the evidence in this case, that what was sought to be mortgaged by the document of 25th June 1921 was: firstly, premises No. 187, Darmahatta Street, Calcutta, the boundaries whereof were set out in the document itself; and, in the second place, one cotta of land described in the document as follows:

In mouza Ekona, parganah Arrah, district Shahabad, Touzi No. 11292, Khewat No. 2, Thana No. 77, Khasra 132, Khasra No. 332, land one cotta kayemi, whereof the boundaries were set out as follows:

North, Hirdeya Rai; south, Chhakan Rai; east Padam Rai, west Deeki Rai.

Now, apart from the question of boundaries of this one cotta of land, there cannot be much doubt that what was sought to be mortgaged was a permanent occupancy right in one cotta of land within certain boundaries. That that was so is abundantly clear from the use of the word "kayemi." The word "kayemi" is never used, as far as I know in describing zamindari interest in land by any person. The word is always used in connexion with the description of tenants' rights in land and, as stated above, it means a permanent occupancy holding. Therefore, what was sought to be mortgaged was merely the tenants' permanent interest in one cotta of land. It is further clear on the evidence in this case that the mortgagors had no tenants' interest in one cotta of land in mouza Ekona. This in itself would be sufficient to demonstrate the invalidity of the registration of the deed. Moreover, the description given of the said one cotta of land is inaccurate in every particular. The description of boundaries that is given in the document is really the description of the entire plot 332 consisting of no less than 21 cottas, and it is not and cannot be the description of any one cotta of land in the said plot. Therefore, apart from what can be deduced from the use of the word "kayemi," it is clear that the subject-matter of the mortgage has not been identified at all for the purposes of registration within the meaning of S. 21, Registration Act. What is the result then? The result is, as has been laid down in the section itself, and in a series of cases on that section, that there could not have been a valid registration of a document of this nature within the meaning of S. 21, Registration Act. If it has been registered, the fact of the registration, in the circumstances of this case, confers no validity whatsoever. Therefore, it follows that no rights whatsoever had accrued to the mortgagors by reason of the execution of the mortgage of 25th June 1921 and the invalid registration thereof. It follows, therefore, that the plaintiff firm are entitled to ask for the declarations which they have prayed for in their plaint. It was argued, however, that there was no difficulty whatsoever by reason of the insufficient description of the one cotta of land in the document of 25th June 1921, because the transaction in substance was a mortgage of a 1/21 share in the land comprised in plot 332 and that whatever uncertainty there was in the description could be removed or cured by reason of partition proceedings being instituted by the mortgagee after he had obtained the mortgage decree on the mortgage. To that the answer is: first, that 1/21 share of interest in land comprised in plot 332 is not the subject-matter of the mortgage of 25th June 1921, and, therefore, no useful purpose can be served by founding an argument on facts which are not the facts in issue in this case. Secondly, the argument neglects altogether the considerations which flow from the use of the word "kayemi" to which reference has already been made. Therefore, the answer is twofold and they are as set out above; and these answers, it seems to me, are absolutely fatal to any contention that may be raised on behalf of the appellant. The result, therefore, is that there are no merits whatsoever in this appeal and it must be dismissed with costs.

Corporation of Calcutta—Complainant—Opposite Party.

Criminal R^{evn}. No. 1188 of 1927, Decided on 5th January 1928.

Calcutta Municipal Act, S. 385 (1) and S. 488 (1) and (2)—Conviction under S. 385 (1) read with S. 488 (1)—Continuing to work mill after conviction is not continuance of the offence—Second conviction is bad.

The accused set up a flour mill intending to work it by electricity without the previous written permission of the Corporation and was convicted under S. 385, Cl. (1) read with S. 488, Cl. (1), and was sentenced to pay a fine on 30th March 1927. After the said conviction, he worked the mill from 1st April onwards. For this he was prosecuted for having committed an offence under S. 385, Cl. (1) read with S. 488, Cl. (2), and was sentenced to pay a daily fine of Rs. 10.

Held: that once the mill has begun to work with electricity, etc., the thing passes beyond the range of intention and it cannot be said to be a continuance of the same offence, but must be regarded as a new offence altogether and the conviction is bad in law and must be set aside. [P 388 C 1]

Judgment.—The question involved in this Rule is one of considerable nicety and of some importance. The petitioner set up a flour mill in a room at premises No. 139-1, Russa Road, intending to work it by electricity without the previous written permission of the Corporation and was convicted under S. 385, Cl. (1) read with S. 488, Cl. (1), Calcutta Municipal Act, and was sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 10 on 30th March 1927. Since the said conviction he, to quote the words of the sanitary officer, "worked the mill from the 1st April onwards." That officer further deposed thus:

I inspected the mill in May and I found it working. After the last conviction the accused did not apply for permission under S. 385 nor has he got any. If the accused had applied, the permission would have been refused as the site and locality are unsuitable for the working of an electric mill.

For this he was prosecuted for having committed an offence under S. 385, Cl. (1) read with S. 488, Cl. (2) of the Act for a period of 30 days commencing from the 1st April 1927, and was sentenced to pay a daily fine of Rs. 10, i. e., to an aggregate fine of Rs. 300. He has then obtained the present Rule.

The question that arises for consideration is whether what was done by the petitioner amounted to a continuance of the offence mentioned in S. 385, Cl. (1) of the Act. The ingredients of an offence contemplated by that section are: first, the new establishment or material alteration, enlargement or extension of factory, workshop or workplace, and, second, an intention to employ steam, electricity, water or other mechanical power therein. It is conceivable that the establishment should be in progress or that the alteration, enlargement or extension should be made after a conviction is once had, and, if any of these things is done, the second ingredient mentioned above being present, the act would amount to a continuance of the offence mentioned in the section. Once, however, the mill has begun to work with electricity, etc., the thing passes beyond the range of intention that forms the second ingredient of the section, and it cannot be said to be a continuance of the same offence, but must be regarded as a new offence altogether. It is not necessary to enquire whether the legislature has provided for such an offence, but evidently it has in S. 386, Cl. (1) of the Act. The argument upon which the learned Magistrate has relied a good deal, namely, the disparity between the daily fines provided for continuing offences relating to S. 385, Cl. (1) and those relating to S. 386, Cl. (1) cannot be of any assistance in construing the meaning of the said sections. It is not difficult to explain this disparity, and I do not feel pressed by the argument that to hold as above will be to make the petitioner liable to lesser penalty. I think the statute has made ample provisions for safeguarding the interests of all concerned and it is not necessary to strain the words of S. 385, sub-S. (1) to include within it cases which, on the face of the wording thereof, are outside its scope and which easily and clearly come within the next section.

In this view of the matter I am of opinion that the conviction of the petitioner is bad in law and must be set aside, and the fine, if paid, should be refunded. The Rule is accordingly made absolute.

It appears that there is considerable dispute as regards the date when the petitioner applied to the Corporation for permission to establish or to work the mill. In the interest of everybody, the matter should be cleared up and it is desirable that the permission should either be granted or definitely refused as speedily as possible, and, in the latter case, if that be the case, effective measures should be adopted so that the statutory authority of the Corporation may not be defied or flouted.

Civil Rule No. 512 of 1927, Decided on 22nd June 1927, from order of Munsif 4th Court, Diamond Harbour (24 Paraganas), D/- 16th March 1927, in Suit No 258 of 1926.

Bengal Tenancy Act, S. 105—Suit in ejectment—Defendant cannot get advantage of stay of proceedings under S. 111 by merely raising a question of status.

Section 111 does not mean that in any case in which the defendant chooses to raise a question as to status the landlord is prevented from taking action under the ordinary law in such matters. [P 388 C 2]

A suit in ejectment was brought against the defendant alleging that he was an under-raiyat and that notice had been given under S. 49. The defendant claimed to be an occupancy-raiyat, and having claimed to be an occupancy-raiyat he contended that by S. 111 the proceedings against him should in effect be stayed until three months after the final republication of the record-of-rights.

Held: S. 111 did not apply to the case: 3 C. L. J. 133; 3 C. L. J. 63n; and A. I. R. 1926 Cal. 1211; Ref. [P 389 C 1]

Rankin, C. J.—In this case a suit in ejectment was brought against the defendant alleging that he was an under-raiyat and that notice had been given under S. 49, Ben. Ten. Act. The defendant, by his written statement, claimed to be an occupancy-raiyat, and, having claimed to be an occupancy-raiyat he contends that by S. 111, Ben. Ten. Act the proceedings against him should in effect be stayed until three months after the final publication of the record-of-rights.

The Court below has refused this contention and said that the suit is one for recovery of khas possession and S. 111 does not apply to the case.

I am of opinion that the Court below is right in the view it has taken of S. 111. I do not think that it can be imputed to the section as to its meaning that in any case, in which the defendant chooses to raise a question as to status, the landlord is prevented from taking action under the ordinary law in such matters.

We have been referred to a judgment in Kanak Kanti Roy v. Srishtidar Mondal (1). There are certain passages in that judgment which give colour to the contention of the present petitioner, but, upon a careful consideration of S. 111 and its real meaning, I am not of opinion that it can be laid down that in any case where the defendant chooses to raise a question of status the plaintiffs are rendered powerless so far as the civil Court is concerned.

The rule is discharged with costs, the hearing-fee being assessed at one gold mohur.

Costello, J.—I agree. I only desire to add that in my opinion the point raised is amply covered by a decision of Mitra, J., in Nasarulla Mia v. Amiruddi (2). In that case the suit was one for rent and the defendant pleaded non-liability denying the relationship of landlord and tenant. He claimed the status of a jotedar or occupancy raiyat and put forward the record-of-rights and settlement rent-roll published on 20th October 1900 as a bar to the plaintiff's claim. The plaintiff's contention was that neither S. 105-H nor S. 111-A, Ben. Ten. Act, applied to the facts of that case. The learned Judge in his judgment said: "We think this contention is sound and the appeal must be allowed." There is also a similar decision in the same volume: see Rajaram Singh v. Sheo Pershad Roy (3) of the Calcutta Law Journal at p. 63 of the Notes portion at the end of the volume.

Civil Rule No. 1068 of 1927, Decided on 9th January 1928, from order of 2nd Munsif, Bogra, D/- 30th April 1927, in S. C. O. Suit No. 680 of 1926.

(a) Contract Act, S. 69—Words "interested in the payment of money" explained.

The words "interested in the payment of money" in S. 69 include an apprehension of any kind of loss or inconvenience or, at any rate, any detriment capable of being assessed in money, while the same is not enough under the common law to found a claim for reimbursement.

[P 391 C 1]

S sold seven wans of land to one K who gave in usufructuary mortgage three-and-half wans of land to one J. Out of these three and half wans of land, two wans of land were purchased by P from one C to whose share the land came as a donee from S. Later, mortgagee J instituted a suit against P and others for getting possession of two wans of land. In the suit P, as defendant, set up a title paramount and averred that his purchase was before mortgage and it was not affected by the same. The mortgage decree that was obtained by the said mortgagee was put into execution, and in the application for execution P appeared as judgment-debtor and land was included in the schedule of properties as one of the mortgaged properties. The property was advertised for sale. Upon this, P paid up the entire decretal amount in order to redeem his share. Thereafter, P instituted a suit for recovery of that sum.

Held: that, considering the circumstance in which deposit was made, plaintiff was entitled to be reimbursed under S. 69: 28 All. 563; 33 Mad. 232; and 19 C. L. J. 72; Ref. [P 391 C 1]

The words of S. 70, Contract Act, are very wide, and, applied with discretion, they enable the Court to do substantial justice in a case where it would be difficult to impute to the person concerned relation actually created by a contract. For the application of that section three elements are necessary, viz., first, that the act should be lawfully done for another; second, that it should not be the doer's intention to do it gratuitously; and third, that the other party should enjoy the benefit of it: A. Judgment.—This rule is directed against the decree of the Munsif, First Court, Bogra, by which the learned Munsif, acting as a Judge of a Court of Small Causes, has dismissed the petitioner's suit. The suit was for recovery of a sum of Rs. 133 odd from the defendants upon certain allegations, which, as far as can be made out from the arguments, are not at present disputed. The facts, shortly stated, are these:

One Samat sold seven wans of land to one Khoshi Bibi in 1315. In 1325 Koshi Bibi gave in usufructuary mortgage three-and-half wans out of the said seven wans of land to one Jamatulla and others. Among these three-and-half wans of land was a plot, which, according to the petitioner, had been purchased by him in the year 1322 from one Chand Bibi. The petitioner's case was that Samat had made an oral gift of 16 wans of land to Chand Bibi and three others and that, after the death of Samat which took place in 1318 B. S., there was a partition of the said 16 wans of land amongst the said donees, and that this particular plot fell to the share of Chand Bibi. After the mortgage aforesaid, the mortgagees, Jamatulla and others, instituted a suit against the petitioner and others, alleging that they had obtained possession under the usufructuary mortgage in respect of only one-and-half wans of land and that they could not get possession of the remaining two wans and for that reason they instituted the suit for a declaration of their usufructuary mortgage right to the said two wans of land and praying for khas possession thereof and in the alternative for a decree for sale of the mortgaged properties. In that suit the petitioner, as defendant, set up a title paramount and averred that his purchase was before the mortgage and it was not affected by the same. That litigation ended in a decree passed by the Subordinate Judge on appeal, who upheld the decree for sale made by the trial Court, but held that the petitioner would not be bound by the sale of the said two wans of land which in the said decree was described as plot 3 of the plaint of that suit.

The mortgage decree that was obtained by the said mortgagees was put into execution and in the application for execution that was filed the petitioner's name appeared as the first judgment-debtor and plot 3 was also included in the schedule of properties, the said plot being mentioned as one of the mortgaged properties and the decree was sought to be executed in respect of that property as well. An order was made for the sale of the mortgaged properties as applied for on behalf of the mortgagees, and this particular plot was advertised for sale. Upon that the petitioner paid up the entire decretal amount by putting in the sum in Court under an order passed by the executing Court which stated that the amount deposited as aforesaid should be received and that the execution case should be dismissed on full satisfaction and the decree-holder permitted to withdraw the money. Thereafter the petitioner instituted the present suit for recovery of the said sum of Rs. 133 odd from the defendants. The learned Munsif has dismissed the suit holding that the plaintiff had no right to be reimbursed either under the provisions of S. 69 or of S. 70, Contract Act. The learned Munsif has observed in his judgment that as the plaintiff's purchase had been made long before the date of the mortgage, and as the mortgage suit was dismissed so far as it was against the petitioner, and it being ordered in the judgment of the appellate Court in that suit that his interests in the land were not to be affected by the sale, the plaintiff had no right to make the deposit under S. 69, Contract Act. He, moreover, held that the payment which the plaintiff made cannot be said to have been made "lawfully" within the meaning of the word as used in S. 70, Contract Act. He held that the deposit made as aforesaid by the plaintiff was a mere voluntary payment and, therefore, he was not entitled to be reimbursed. In this view of the matter the learned Munsif, as I have already said, dismissed the suit.

The arguments that have been addressed to me on behalf of the petitioner in this rule have been to the effect that, in the view which the learned Munsif has taken both as regards the provisions of S. 69 and of S. 70, Contract Act, the learned Munsif has been in error. So far as S. 69, Contract Act, is concerned it is to be noted that, notwithstanding the declaration which the petitioner had obtained in his favour in the mortgage suit and which was to the effect that his interest in plot 3 of the plaint in the suit would not be affected by the sale, the mortgagees decree-holders purported to proceed against the petitioner also, making no reservation whatsoever in respect of his interest in plot 3 with regard to which there was a declaration of exemption as I have already stated. It has been urged on behalf of the opposite party that, although this was the state of things, the fact that there was a declaration in favour of the petitioner by a competent Court which had finally determined that the interest of the petitioner in plot 3 would not be affected by the sale, was sufficient to take away any interest which the petitioner might otherwise have in the payment of the month and that the apprehension, if any, which he entertained by reason of the property being advertised for sale, was without foundation, and that he had no justification whatsoever such as would give him the right to be reimbursed under the provisions of S. 69, Contract Act. To accept this argument of the opposite party would be to put the petitioner in a worse position than he otherwise would be in, merely because he had succeeded in obtaining beforehand a declaration protecting his rights, and I am clearly of opinion that, in the circumstances of the case, the petitioner, by reason of the apprehension which he entertained of the sale which was going to take place in respect of the plot which belonged to him, had an interest in the payment of the money which the other judgment-debtors in that case were bound by law to pay. The mere fact that there was a declaration in his favour is not sufficient to take away that interest. The decisions under S. 69, Contract Act, have made it perfectly plain that the words "interested in the payment of money," as used in that section, include an apprehension of any kind of loss or inconvenience or, at any rate, any detriment capable of being assessed in money while the same is not enough under the common law to found a claim for reimbursement. Reference in this connexion may be made to the decisions of Stanley, C. J., of the Allahabad High Court, in the case of Tulsha Kunwar v. Jogeshwar Prasad (1), of the Madras High Court in the case of Subramania Iyer v. Vengappa Reddi (2) and of this Court in the case of Pankhabati Chaudhurani v. Nonihal Singh (3). I am, therefore, of opinion that the case comes directly within the purview of S. 69, Contract Act, and in the circumstances in which the deposit is alleged to have been made by the plaintiff he is entitled to be reimbursed under the provisions of that section.

It is not necessary, in view of what I have just said, to deal with the question as to whether S. 70 would or would not apply to this case. But, even if I am wrong in the view that I have taken with regard to S. 69, I think that the case comes also within the purview of S. 70, Contract Act. It is true that the interest of the petitioner in plot 3 of the suit, to which reference has already been made, was protected by the decree; but the existence of an interest is not always, though it is generally, a test which establishes the lawful character of a payment. In these circumstances it stands to reason to hold that such interest as the petitioner had in the sale was a sufficient interest which would make the deposit that he made a lawful payment within the meaning of S. 70. It has been held in a large number of decisions to which it is not necessary to refer on the present occasion, inasmuch as they have been discussed in a recent decision of this Court in the case of Nagendra Nath v. Jugal Kishore Roy (4), that the words of S. 70, Contract Act, are very wide and, applied with discretion, they enable the Court to do substantial justice in a case where it would be difficult to impute to the person concerned relation actually created by a contract. It has been pointed out in that case that for the application of that section three elements are necessary, viz.: first, that the act should be lawfully done for another; second, that it should not be the doer's intention to do it gratuitously, and third, that the other party should enjoy the benefit of it. So far as the second and third elements are concerned, there can be no question that they are present in the present case. As regards the first of these elements: it is sufficient to refer to the case of Suchand Ghoshal v. Balaram Mardana (5), a case which, in my opinion, makes the nearest approach to the present one in which Sir Lawrence Jenkins, C. J., observed that if a deposit were made with the approval of the Court it should be held that it was a deposit made lawfully. I am, therefore, of opinion that this rule should be made absolute, that the decree against which it is directed should be set aside and the case should be sent back to the Court of the learned Munsif, so that the other issues which arise in the suit may now be dealt with and disposed of in accordance with law. Costs of this rule, one gold mohur, will abide the result of the suit.

N.K.

Rule made absolute.

B. B. GHOSH AND ROY, JJ.

Dinanath Kundu and others—Defendants—Appellants.

v.

Janaki Nath Roy and others—Plaintiffs—Respondents.

Appeals Nos. 135 of 1925, and 41 of 1926, Decided on 23rd June 1927, from original decrees of Sub-Judge, Faridpur, D/- 28th May 1925.

(a) Landlord and Tenant — Lease whether permanent—Surrounding circumstances and entire terms of lease must be looked into—Tenant taking leases for different terms—Last lease in different form and purporting to give a high premium and high rate of rent—Lease was held to be permanent lease.

Unless the words clearly indicate permanency of lease, the surrounding circumstances and the entire terms of the lease must be looked into in order to ascertain the nature of the grant. [P 394 C 1]

The property originally belonged to a zamindar from whom the predecessor-in-interest of the defendants first took a lease of the property in 1876 for a term of three years. On the expiry of the term of that lease, other leases were taken for different terms from time to time by the same lessees from the landlord. The lease just before the one in question was taken in 1895. This was for a term of five years, which was to terminate at the end of the Bengali year 1307, corresponding to the middle of April 1901. Before the expiry of the term of that lease, the present defendants took the lease in dispute by executing a kabuliyat, dated 21st September 1900. The most important provisions in it being : "I had been till now in possession of the haut, etc., by taking a temporary miadi, ijara settlement of the same and realizing rents. I prayed to you for having granted a bemiadi settlement of the haut, etc..... and you, on receiving a salami of Rs. 3,500 from me and fixing the annual rent at Rs. 800, granted my prayer and made me a bemiadi settlement of the haut..... I appear before you and agreeing to pay a rent of Rs. 800 per annum, I execute this deed of bemiadi, kabuliyat." The plaintiffs in the suit acquired the interest which originally belonged to the landlord by virtue of a purchase at a sale in execution of a mortgage decree on 28th April 1921.

Held : that it can hardly be reasonable to suppose that the tenant paid Rs. 3,500 as salami and consented to increase the rent to Rs. 800 in order to take a lease which might be terminated the next month or the next year at the will of the landlord. Taking all these facts into consideration the only reasonable conclusion was that the lease was a permanent one, instead of giving the lessee a more precarious right than what he had under the temporary lease which preceded it. [P 394 C 2]

(b) Words "sarsari" and "bemiadi."

A "sarsari" lease no doubt connotes the idea of a temporary settlement. But coupled with the expression "bemiadi" it can only mean a permanent lease but variable as to rent. [P 395 C 2]

Unless it could be definitely shown that the tenancy was to commence at a particular date different from the date of the document by which it was created, it must be held ordinarily that the year of the tenancy commences from the date of the document. [P 396 C 1]

(d) Transfer of Property Act, S. 107 — In Bengal a lease evidenced only by a kabuliyat creates lease as much as by a patta executed by landlord and accepted by tenants.

It has all along been the practice, in Bengal at any rate, to create large leasehold interests of a permanent nature by accepting a kabuliyat from the tenant, or, in other words, a kabuliyat executed by the tenant and accepted by the landlord is as much a lease as a patta executed by the landlord and accepted by the tenant. Dwarkanath Chakravarti, Nirmal Chandra Chakravarti, Bansori Lal Sarkar and Ajendra Nath Dutt—for Appellants.

S. C. Basak, Jotindra Mohan Bose, Nagendra Chandra Chaudhuri, Birendra Chandra Das and Bepin Chandra Bose—for Respondents.

B. B. Ghosh, J.—These two appeals by the defendants arise out of two actions in ejectment which were decreed by the Subordinate Judge. The plaintiffs brought the suits on the ground that the defendants were in possession of the leaseholds in temporary right under two leases evidenced by two kabuliyats, dated 21st September 1900 and 4th August 1903, respectively. The suit, out of which appeal No. 135 of 1925 arises, relates to the kabuliyat of the 21st September 1900. The parties to the two suits are the same. The questions on which the decision of the two appeals depends are also the same. There were two suits, only because there were two separate leaseholds under two separate leases. Notices were served, dated 20th Bhadra 1329 B. S., corresponding to 6th September 1922, and it was alleged that the notices were to terminate the lease at the end of the Bengali year on 30th Chaitra 1329 corresponding to some date in the middle of April 1923. The suits were brought on 20th September 1923. The Subordinate Judge decreed both the suits and various grounds were discussed in his judgment. In these appeals the appellants raise only two points for con-
